Mr. C. said that the grants which had been made for seminaries of learning; so far as he had examined them, had either been made upon some one of the considerations which he had mentioned, (for example, the enhancement of the value of the remaining public lands,) or in consideration of concessions made by the States upon their admission into the Union. He spoke more particularly in reference to the grant made to Alabama for the establishment and support of a seminary of learning. But what was required of that State in turn? Nothing less than the surrender of some of the most important rights of sovereignty, common to the older States; whilst we were told, in the act passed for our admission, and in the resolution declaring it, that we were admitted, or to be admitted, "upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever." Yes, sir, we were compelled to disclaim all right to the primary disposal of unappropriated soil within our chartered limits, and to abandon all right to tax the lands of the United States, or lands sold by the United States, till five years after such sale. He said he knew nothing pertaining to sovereignty of more importance than the power of taxation; without it, he presumed, no Government could long exist. Again, when this grant was made to Alabama, the Government of the United States still owned a large quantity of land within her limits, the value of which was augmented.

Mr. C. said that one gentleman who had addressed the House, (he did not then recollect from what State,) had urged the claim of the old States to this distribution of the public land, on the ground that they had achieved the independence of the country. The argument had struck Mr. C. with some surprise. The gentleman could not certainly mean that the independence of our country had been achieved by those who now reside in the old States and by their ancestors; and could not the people of the new States claim the same ancestry? Had not they, and indeed some of those who fought the battles of the revolution, emigrated from the old States? They had, [he said] and had shown themselves, in the late war, worthy of such ancestry; they had evinced as much courage, as much enterprise, and as much patriotism, as the people of any other section of the Union. Mr. C. said, he invited the attention of every gentleman to an examination of the terms of these grants; and repeated, that he had full confidence that each one of them would be found to be grants, upon some adequate consideration, or for the accomplishment of some national work. Under these impressions, he hoped that the amendment under consideration would be promptly rejected.

When Mr. CLAY concluded, Mr. HUNT obtained the floor, but had not proceeded far, when the hour allotted for the consideration of resolutions having elapsed, the remainder of his remarks was deferred to another day.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1830.

The principal part of this day was spent in disposing of motions for inquiry.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1830.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution, moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th ultimo, concerning a distribution of the public lands among the several States.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN, on the same day, to amend the same.

Mr. HUNT resumed the remarks which he commenced on Tuesday, when the subject was last under consideration. He said, as the original resolution contained no specific instructions, he did suppose it would pass in silence to the committee, and that when they might report a bill, if they should think proper to do so, the merits of the whole subject would then be open to the discussion and action of this House. But it had taken a course different from what he anticipated, and become the occasion of a protracted debate, and an excitement unpleasant to doubt to many gentlemen on this floor. The honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] wishing to avoid the difficulties in which the House was placed, proposed that the original resolution should be withdrawn, and a substitute offered in its place. Mr. H. said that he was willing to adopt any plan or take any course that might advance the accomplishment of the object expressed in the resolution, but to do nothing that may retard or defeat it, and that he was not disposed at present to withdraw his resolution, because the House had on two occasions expressed a wish to retain it, upon the vote of consideration being taken. If [said he] I surrender the resolution now before the House for a substitute that may be offered, may not the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN] or some other member, propose again the same amendment that now embarrasses this House?

The amendment, which is now the question before the House, merely directs the committee to ascertain the value and quantity of the public land that has already been given to particular States and institutions. It is manifest, sir, that the value cannot be ascertained without much time and expense, or even an actual appraisement; but, for all the purposes of legislation, we may assume the ordinary price of the public lands to be the fair and average value. The quantity of land given to particular States and institutions has already been obtained; it is appended to a report made to the House during the last session, and is open to the inspection of every one. It would therefore seem that there was no necessity for this inquiry; neither would there appear to be any serious objection to it so far as it relates to the information sought for; but there was an objection to the object which the gentleman intended to make of that information. The honorable mover [Mr. MARTIN] avows that it is his intention to call the States to an account, which have received lands; and to make deductions from them to the extent of their donations, before they can be placed upon an equality with the other States in the contemplated distribution.

It is well known that donations of the public lands have been chiefly made to the new Southern and Western States. To these States, [said Mr. H.] I am not disposed to be rigid. I would be just, and so far as consistent with my duty here, I would be liberal—and, sir, the numerous grants that have been made to these States afford evidence that the Union at large is disposed to be liberal.

The grants heretofore made have been for good and sufficient reasons, for State and national objects; and it is not for us to question them. They have vested rights in these States and their institutions, which we ought not, by any acts of our legislation, to take away or impair.

The plan, as proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN] of making deductions from some States, and giving to others, and thus, in his own language, to strike the balance sheet, cannot be done with any degree of justice that can give satisfaction. When grants have been for the construction of roads, canals, the improvement of navigable rivers, or for the purposes of education, the benefits resulting from them are not confined exclusively to the States that have received the donations for those purposes, but are enjoyed in part by the adjoining States. It is unnecessary to enumerate particular cases for illustration. I will, however, refer to the case of the donation made by Congress, in 1823, to the State of Alabama, of four hundred thousand acres of land for improving the navigation of the Tennessee river, by the Muscle shoals, situate on the northern extremity of that State. This river takes its origin in the State of Virginia, thence it passes through the eastern and southern part of Tennessee, into the northern section of Alabama, where the improvement is contemplated; it then turns and runs through the whole width of Tennessee, and into the State of Kentucky, where it empties its waters into the Ohio river. It is palpably manifest that the principal advantages to result from this improvement will not be confined to the inhabitants of Alabama. And shall the value of the four hundred thousand acres be deducted from that State, when the adjoining States will derive more benefits from the improvement than the State of Alabama itself? The public domain, and the grants that have been made, are of such a nature, and embrace such a variety of interests, that justice among the States is not to be done mathematically. We cannot, sir, like clerks in a counting-house, deduct one-half of one per cent. from one partner for some little advance, and give it to another; and thus strike the balance sheet. If we undertake to do justice in this manner according to the rules of arithmetic, we shall do injustice in every other sense of the word.

Mr. H. observed that his object in offering the resolution was to prevent the further continuance of the present course of partial and unequal legislation of special grants to particular States and institutions, and to introduce a general system for the equal distribution of the avails of the public lands among all sections of the Union. The General Government has already given, by a great number of particular acts, two millions and a half of acres to particular States and institutions, in addition to the reservations in all the new States of one mile square in each township for the support of schools; and petitions are now before Congress for more than twice that amount. Some of the applications may succeed; others, constituting, no doubt, the greater part, will be rejected; and it is natural that those who are unsuccessful should feel jealous, dissatisfied and discontented, and be impressed with the belief that justice has not been done. It is difficult for Congress, and always invidious, to make selections out of the numerous applications, and must ever be impossible to make an equal distribution and give general satisfaction.

Mr. H. remarked that the gentleman who opposed the resolution deprecated the scrambling for the public lands; so did he; and wished to avoid it, and never to see this House made the arena where the battles of interested applicants for the public lands were to be fought. His object was to prevent these contests, and to substitute a general law, that by its even operation should give to every part of the country its just proportion.

The public domain he considered to be public property, in common to us all. What [said he] is the foundation of our title—whence its origin? The treaty concluded with Great Britain in 1783 acknowledged the right and sovereignty of the United States over a vast extent of territory. This was the result of the war of our independence; a war undertaken in self-defence, and carried to a successful termination by the united efforts of the whole people. The subsequent acquisitions of Louisiana, of the Floridas, the purchases from the Indian tribes, and the contract with Georgia, were all obtained by money drawn from the common treasury. As these lands have been acquired by the common expenditure of treasure and of blood, natural justice would dictate that the benefits to flow from them should be equal, and that they ought not to be appropriated to the aggrandisement of a few, while others, equally entitled, are excluded.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDER] referred to the cession of the territory northwest of the Ohio, made by the State of Virginia; and advanced an opinion that the terms expressed in that grant present an obstacle to the distribution of the public lands, as indicated by the resolution. I am induced, sir, to draw a conclusion entirely the reverse, and to believe that the terms of that cession afford a direction to guide us in the distribution of these lands, and that the resolution is not only not repugnant to the terms of the cession, but in conformity to them. It will not be proper on this occasion to enter into a history of that cession. It will however be recollected that, when we were colonies, some few of the States had claims to extensive tracts of land in the Western country. During the war of the revolution these lands, though not of great value, were susceptible of immense future enhancement; they were then but a mere wilderness, and of course could afford no aid in the prosecution of the war. They rather served as haunts and safe retreats for savages, who made war upon our border settlers. It was foreseen that if independence should be secured, the States having those claims would add immensely to their territories, while others, who had no such claims, but contributed equally to the prosecution of the war, would remain confined within their former limits. This great disparity of interests in the expected results of independence was the cause of no small jealousies among the several States. To appease these jealousies and establish harmony, the Continental Congress, at an early period, earnestly recommended to the States claiming those lands in the Western country, to be liberal in making grants of the same to the United States for the benefit of all. The States of Massachusetts and New York relinquished their title. The State of Connecticut, at a later period, did the same, retaining, however, that tract of land known as the Connecticut Reserve. In 1784 the State of Virginia having a title, as she contended, to the entire territory northwest of the Ohio, after making a reservation in favor of her troops, and some French and Canadian settlers, transferred the whole of that extensive country to the United States; and, in the terms of the cession, expressly declared that the "lands so ceded shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the confederation, or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose, whatsoever." The same language is employed in all the cessions made by individual States to the United States.

The land thus ceded is, in the first place, expressly made a common fund—not for the use and benefit of any particular State or section of country, but for all. The use of this common fund is declared not only for such of the States as were then members of the confederacy, but such as might thereafter become members. It was not limited to their use jointly, in their federal character, but, in the language of the cession, it was given to them respectively, in their separate and independent communities. The rule of distribution is there declared and fixed; which is, according to the proportion of each State in the general charge and expenditure. The basis of this charge and expenditure was the population capable of rendering assistance to the country. It was a just and an equitable one—intended for use, and capable of being put into practice. The principle of distribution is as applicable at this time as when it was established; and it will apply with the same certainty hereafter, when other States may be added to the Union. It is, that each State shall receive from the common fund in proportion to its taxes, expense, and charge, in supporting the General Government. The precise and exact amount of taxation and expense, it is true, cannot be ascertained, nor is it to be expected. It is sufficient that some general rule of distribution among the several States must be adopted. And perhaps there is no better criterion to direct the adoption of a rule of apportionment, than the representation of this House, or, rather, what would be more exact, that population, the federal numbers, which is the basis of our representation. But, sir, it is not necessary at this time to determine upon any particular rule of distribution, as the subject before the House is one of mere inquiry, and not of enactment. The principle of apportionment is well established in the cession made by Virginia, and it will be competent for Congress, at the proper time, to make the application.

Mr. H. concluded by observing that, when appropriations of the public lands were made to a few of the States exclusively, and equal shares were not conceded to the others, justice was not only withheld, but the express terms contained in the cessions made by Virginia, and the other States, were violated.

Mr. POTTER said, that, when he recollected the subject of the resolution before the House, that it proposed nothing definite—nothing conclusive—it appeared to him that this debate was most unnecessarily protracted. Gentlemen took for granted the matter which it is the object of the resolution to ascertain, and have founded their arguments upon what they apprehend might be the report on the resolution, if agreed to. They certainly seemed to be the impression of gentlemen who had spoken in opposition to the amendment; for those from that part of the United States where the amendment pointed, discussed it with as much zeal as if the final proposition to distribute the proceeds of the sale of the public lands amongst the several States, for the purposes contemplated, had been under consideration, and to exact a rigid account of the new States of the proportion they have received. What did the amendment propose? It simply proposes to instruct the committee to lay before the House a statement of the quantity and value of the public lands which have been given to any State, or the public or private institutions thereof. It implies [said Mr. P.] a pledge as to the use which the House will make of this information when obtained. For my own part, [said Mr. P.] I have no disposition to demand a strict reckoning on this score from the people of the new States. No one sympathises more than I do with the difficulties they have had to encounter, or admires more the courage with which they have sustained them. But, before I proceed to act in prospect upon this subject, I wish to see what has been done with it heretofore. It is with a bad grace that gentlemen seek to suppress this information. They talk to us about the valuable public considerations for which the donations in question have been made. Be it so. It will be time enough to bring up those arguments when we have a proposition before us to demand an account of them. All that we want now is such information as will enable us to determine, correctly, whether such an account shall be demanded. Mr. P. said, I would rather have the facts than the statements of any gentleman, whatever might be my own confidence in their integrity. I will never act upon faith when facts can be produced, in relation to any matter whatever, and shall therefore vote for the amendment. There is surely a most fastidious sensibility here upon this subject. We have even heard the title of the Union to these lands drawn into controversy, and a comparison instituted between the military merits of the old and new States. This, sir, is idle. I apprehend there is no man here, who will dare to deny the right of the United States to its own property. That is a proposition I would no more consent to discuss, than the plainest axiom in Euclid. Having been alluded to, however, it was placed on the true ground by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER] who favored us with his remarks on Thursday last, so much to the satisfaction of every one who heard him. We have heard something said of the share which the individual States have contributed of this common stock. The State which I have in part the honor to represent, gave up to the Union a territory, which, whether you look to the quality or the extent of it, forms one of the most valuable portions of the public domain. Yet North Carolina, one of the oldest and most liberal members of the confederacy, has received but a step-child's portion. She will not stoop to the language of complaint, but at a proper time she will present herself to the justice of this House, and of the nation, and in mere justice will ask their co-operation in measures which may be necessary to enable her people to receive and retain in their own hands the avails and the profits of their own labor and industry—measures, in short, which will unchain her navigation, and place her in free and fair communication with the commercial world. This, however, is a consideration not to be gone into at this time. I merely mention it now as that which will govern my vote in this and all similar questions. Our situation in North Carolina requires all the resources we can command; and I feel it to be one of the most sacred duties I owe to my constituents; to take back from the federal treasury every dollar I can put my hand upon of the sum contributed by us, over and above our fair proportion in the general charge and expenditure, to be expended however, at our own option, and under our own direction. I regret to have heard the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HUNT] who introduced this resolution, decline yesterday receiving the proposition which had been suggested, but not actually proposed to the House, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] That proposition even avoids the semblance of a committal on the part of the House, either as to the constitutionality of the power proposed to be exercised, or the time when it will be expedient to put it in operation; and when the amendment before us is disposed of, I will myself, if no one else will, present that proposition as a substitute for the present resolution. It is desirable on another account. It proposes to substitute a select committee for this reference, instead of the Committee on the Public Lands. This is obviously proper; and, from what I have seen of the mass of business before that committee, I am sure they will be obliged to be relieved from the task of this investigation. In giving the pledge to offer a substitute to the resolution before us, I have no disposition to take the management of this matter upon myself. I shall wait, therefore, when the pending amendment is disposed of, to see if some other gentleman will not introduce it.

Mr. LEWIS said, that, as a member from a new State, he felt that no apology was due in claiming for a few minutes the attention of the House. The subject was of one of great interest to the members generally—to the new States it was a matter of incalculable interest. It is no less than a proposition to distribute these lands among the different portions of the Union. In fact, [he said] the process was actually going on, and the Representatives of these States cannot be expected to sit the silent spectators of a scene in which their constituents have so great an interest.

The mover has said that this is a mere question of inquiry; and infers that it should not meet with opposition, until it is embodied in a report from the Committee of the House. Sir, it is a question of inquiry, and one of a character so decisive of the destiny of the new States, that it should be met at the threshold. He thought that it would be well to discuss most propositions on a motion of reference. The question is then fairly presented, divested of all extraneous matter, and the unbiased sense of the House is taken alone upon the merits of the inquiry.

Mr. L. said, he should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, but from views very different from those of the honorable mover. He thought it a requisition of sheer justice, that, before any distribution of the funds of this Government should take place, it should be known what amount the several States have previously received for purposes of education and internal improvement. It was but fair play, and should precede every other inquiry. So far from avoiding such an inquiry, he was disposed to extend it, not only to the donations of land actually received, but to donations of moneys for splendid roads, canals, breakwaters, &c. in different sections of the country.

Mr. L. said, he was, he believed, the only member from the new States, who had declared actually, in favor of the amendment; and he did so, from a conviction that, so far as Alabama was concerned, she had nothing to fear from the investigation. Other gentlemen had asserted the same, in relation to other new States. Then why oppose the amendment? Mr. L. thought that, when the debits and credits were fairly stated between the General Government and Alabama, a considerable balance will be found in her favor. He believed he could get a verdict for that balance, before any impartial committee of this House; and hence he had every reason to invite the inquiry.

Previous to any sales of her lands, it was known that there were to be certain reservations for the purposes of education and internal improvement. These are what gentlemen call donations; but, sir, I think I can prove that she has treble paid for them in the enhanced price of her land, and in her relinquishment of certain portions of her sovereignty. I mean the right of taxing these lands. Can any gentleman believe that these stipulations in favor of the purchasers of public lands did not enhance their price? That they did not enter into the considerations of the purchase, as much as fertility of soil, health of situation, or any other local cause? Yes, sir, these stipulations were as well known at the land sales as they are in this House. They entered into the price of every acre of land, and into the calculations of every individual purchaser, from the keen and cautious speculator to the humblest individual who sought to purchase an eighty acre tract on which to place his little family. Gentlemen who argue differently, must suppose that the people of Alabama are the most uncalculating beings on earth. They are not, perhaps, as calculating as the population of some other sections of the Union; but to impute to them a disregard of such obvious advantages in the settlement of a new country, would amount to a charge of idiocy. As well might it be urged that an acre lot of land, twenty miles from this in the country, would sell for as much as one advantageously situated on Pennsylvania avenue. The conclusion is inevitable, that, whatever advantages were offered by the Government to purchasers before the sales, were well understood at the sales, entered fully into the price of the public lands, and were fairly paid for in an enhanced price. In addition to this, an injudicious promise had been extorted from the State not to tax the public lands, nor the lands of individuals, until five years after their purchase.

Here was another of those favors to the citizens paid for at the land sales. But, [Mr. L. asked] what has been the effect of this concession on the part of Alabama? It has impoverished her finances, and created the necessity of the most oppressive taxes on other kinds of property. Mr. L. said that he was somewhat acquainted with the finances and taxes of Alabama, and he believed that if the lands within her limits had been subjected to as heavy a tax as other property, it would not have fallen as low as the annual amount of fifty thousand dollars since her admission as a State. How long this sacrifice would continue under the present slow, tedious, and objectionable mode of disposing of the public lands by auction, it was impossible for him to calculate. Perhaps at the end of fifty years all the land will not be sold. In one-third, however, of that time, the sacrifice will doubly exceed the value of the land secured to the State by compact. These [Mr. L. observed] were the advantages which Alabama had received from the General Government, and which have been alluded to in this debate. Sir, Alabama has experienced a rigid policy from the Government. At the time that this compact was formed between her and the United States, she was a territory. The General Government stood to her "in loco parentis," in the situation of a guardian to his ward. Alabama as to the exercise of her political rights, was in her minority—in her childhood; and these sacrifices were demanded of her as conditions precedent to her admission into the Union. The compact has been discreditable to this Government, and injurious to Alabama, crippling her energies, destroying her fiscal resources, and, at the same time, operating in every respect advantageously to the United States. Sir, from the situation of the parties at the time of this contract, I am induced to believe that it would be declared a nullity before any equitable tribunal. It was a compact entered into by Alabama, not only in her minority, but under duress and fear of not being otherwise admitted into the Union.

Mr. L. said, allusions have frequently been made in this debate to the splendid donation of four hundred thousand acres of land for the improvement of the Tennessee river. That matter was much misunderstood. It was a donation nominally to Alabama, but really to another section of the country. Sir, if Alabama had pursued a more selfish policy, she never would have accepted that donation. Mr. L. said he was a member of the Legislature which did receive the land in trust for the specified object. He doubted very much whether that Legislature (and he among the rest) had not done injustice to the State in not promptly rejecting the pretended boon. Sir, Alabama has assumed the immense expense of legislation on that subject, and the responsibility of a faithful application of the funds; and yet not more than two counties in the State are, or can be, benefited by the proposed improvement. Other portions of the country, East Tennessee, for example, will be benefited; but he was certain that no benefit would accrue to Alabama, as a State, from the completion of the canal. Sir, it opens a way to no market in that State; on the contrary, it proposes the establishment of a complete thoroughfare through her northern limits, for the produce of other States, to that great mart of western wealth, the city of Orleans.

Mr. L. said there was one way in which Alabama may receive a collateral benefit from this donation; and in that point of view the Legislature were perhaps justifiable in accepting it. He alluded to the control it would give the State over the sale of the lands upon which a respectable portion of her population resided. He believed that it would be found from that experiment, what has here been considered a paradox, that it was possible, without sacrificing the public lands, to dispose of them on liberal terms to the purchaser. He had understood that the commissioners had not pursued the directions of the law in valuing the land, but he believed that, whenever the provisions of that act were carried into effect, (though he did not believe it equal to some other plans proposed,) it will be found that the mode of entering public lands at fixed prices would be far better than the sale of them by auction. Mr. L. said he hoped at least the lesson would be of some service here. If this effect was not answered by the donation, he was certain the State could derive no benefit equal to her expense and responsibility in making an application of the grant to the specified object. And yet, sir, this is the great donation which Alabama has received from the Government, and which has been so often cast into our teeth during this discussion.

Mr. L. said, he had spoken of Alabama particularly, in the above remarks, because he was unacquainted with the legislation of Congress in relation to other new States. If they had been more successful applicants for the favors of the Government, and had received more substantial benefits, it was for other gentlemen to point them out.

Mr. L. asked what had the Government done for the new States, in the disposition of the public lands. He believed no other nation had pursued so rigid a course in the disposal of her public domain. But, sir, the evil could be better tolerated if there was a corresponding advantage resulting to the Government from this course. Sir, it is a singular fatality attending the sales by auction, that they are alike injurious to the Government and the people; that while the Government scarcely ever receives more than the minimum price, the settler is universally forced to pay a price ranging from two to ten dollars an acre for his land. This, sir, is the premium which the law gives to speculation out of the hard earnings of honest industry.

JAN. 7, 1830.]

Distribution of Public Lands.

[H. of R.]

Encouraged by the system, individuals come from even the adjoining States, and form combinations of capital so strong as to put down all competition. Hence they bid off the land at a dollar and a quarter, and exact from the actual settler a premium of from fifty to a thousand per cent.

Mr. L. said, he had attended the land sales, and witnessed these results. They are the inevitable consequences of the system, and it is impossible for human laws to put them down so long as the system continues. At every land sale, the whole community are placed competitors in the power of speculators, and are forced to pay them tribute for the improvements which they themselves have placed on the public lands—even for the shelters which cover their families. And still the Government receives only the minimum price. The people and the Legislature have remonstrated, year after year, against this system, and yet their prayers have not been heard. Lest the lands might not bring all that they could, under any circumstances, this policy has been continued. Nevertheless, the new States have been considered, and, I fear, have sometimes considered themselves as dependant on the Government for its favors. In fact, sir, these impressions have a tendency to reduce them to a state of vassalage to this Government. It is high time the delusion should be removed. Mr. L. said he wished to see every State independent of this Government, and to feel and recognise that independence. He was certain that Alabama was not in arrears to the Government for favors, and he desired, by a report of a committee, that others should know it, and that the public mind should be disabused on this subject. For these reasons, he had determined to vote for the amendment.

Mr. L. said, he did not wish Alabama to lie under the imputation of being indebted to the bounty of the General Government for any exclusive favors; for favors create a servile dependance. The only benefits which any State should receive are such as appertain to all, and result from a constitutional exercise of the powers entrusted to Congress.

As to the original amendment, he was opposed to it in toto, even though the amendment should prevail. He was opposed to it because the public lands were pledged for the redemption of the public debt. They were now discharging that debt, and there was an impropriety and delicacy in applying them to any other object. The proceeds of those lands are now lessening the amount of the public debt; and to what object more national can they be applied? What other disposition can be made of them so just and equal? And will gentlemen divert the funds of this Government from an object so purely national to objects of a local and sectional character, unauthorized, as it is believed, by the constitution? I have yet to learn that the constitution authorizes the action of this Government in relation to either of these subjects, education or improvement.

Sir, I have been admonished that little respect is paid to any reference which may be made to the constitution in this House; but, sir, I am a junior member, and must abide by it as the rule of my conduct, until I am absolved from the obligations of the oath taken at your table.

Mr. L. observed, much was said about the extravagant recommendations in Mr. Adams's first message, of national universities, observatories, &c.; and yet he feared that gentlemen who then derided these opinions as the vagaries of a visionary statesman, are about to adopt the same principles, by voting an application of the national funds to the same objects. This House has once decided against a Committee on Education. And why? Because such matters were not under the cognizance of the House. Gentlemen may draw the distinction that the proposition involves nothing more than a donation to the several States for the purposes of education and internal improvement. He thought it a distinction without a difference. If Congress furnishes the means for the erection of college buildings, or internal improvement, it contributes more efficiently to the ends than if each member were to take a spade or trowel in his hand, and proceed to the manual execution of the work. Besides, what difference was there between the appropriation of national lands and national money to local objects? They are one and the same thing. If we withdraw the proceeds of the public lands, the vacuum will have to be supplied by taxation. Then what is the difference between the proceeds of the public lands and other money, or between public land and hard dollars? They are means convertible to the same end. As a Southern man he felt bound to oppose any application of the national funds, by taking them from an object so national as the payment of the public debt, and appropriating them to any local or sectional purposes. This has been the ground of complaint with the South. The Southern people never murmured at any contributions which have been levied on them for the general good, but have objected to every dollar applied to less national objects.

Mr. L. said, that, as a citizen of a new State, he should oppose the proposition, as unjust and unequal to the new States. What was the value of these lands before they were reclaimed and subdued by the enterprise of the first settlers? To quote the language of the mover of these resolutions, (the honorable gentleman from Vermont,) they were "waste and uncultivated deserts." Sir, their value has been imparted to them by the industry, enterprise, and sufferings of that hardy population who precede the comforts and conveniences of a more advanced condition of every newly settling country. Who levelled the forests, who opened the roads, who established the towns, who gave, in fact, a determinate value to all the lands in the country, by converting a wilderness into a country possessing all the comforts of cultivated life? The people of Alabama. The labor and hardship was with them; and shall they be placed on no better footing than the old States? Shall they receive but three shares out of two hundred and thirteen, in all the lands within their limits? Shall their improvements and industry be sold and distributed, for the purpose of establishing roads and canals, schools and colleges, in other States, whose citizens have shared with them none of the hardships, the labor, and the sufferings, of settling the country? Sir, the proposition is unjust, and the system would render the new States tributary to the old. Besides, what would be the share of Alabama under this system? Three shares would probably be worth fifteen thousand dollars, and yet her citizens pay perhaps four or five hundred thousand dollars a year for land. A constant drain upon the resources of the State to this vast amount, a continued current of circulation setting from them in its onward course, with the paltry return of fifteen thousand dollars. This is too much the case at present; but the citizens of Alabama will not complain so long as this money goes in payment of a debt incurred in defence of national rights and honor. If applied to any local purpose, they will and ought to complain.

From whence [asked Mr. L.] does this proposition come? From Virginia, whose contributions of land to the General Government have been more than all the other States? No, sir; that great and patriotic State, whose generosity is so often complimented on this floor, and whose name is identified with every sacrifice of blood or treasure in defence of this Government—she, I say, sir, does not ask, and would be the last to ask, this distribution at our hands. North Carolina has also made an important cession off lands to the Government. I hope a majority of that State do not demand the distribution. South Carolina and Georgia have also made large cessions of lands, and I am persuaded neither of them will favor this project. From what quarter, then, does the proposition present itself? From Vermont—a State which has made no cession whatever to the Government; and that, sir, in the absence of Virginia, whose liberality has created the largest portion of the fund which it is proposed to divide. He hoped the question would not be taken until Virginia was fully represented on this floor. He should make such a motion if no one else did.

Mr. L. said, he was opposed to the proposition for another reason. It would be a means of continuing the present oppressive rates of impost duties. The withdrawal of every dollar from the present purpose of paying the national debt, produces that result. The Southern States had hoped for some alleviations of their burdens after the payment of that debt. They had thought, that, after the necessities of the revenue had ceased, these duties would be taken off. But, sir, the race of politicians who believe that a national debt is a national blessing, is not yet extinct. They exist in full force in this House. He had but little experience in the legislation of Congress, but he thought it required very moderate foresight to perceive that the friends of the tariff would go en masse for this proposition. It will serve as a pretext for keeping up the high rate of duties, and of continuing their exactions on the South. How, then, can southern gentlemen who are opposed to the tariff vote for this proposition? There is, sir, a tax-paying and a tax-receiving portion in this Union. The interest of the one is to create, and of the other to avoid, a public debt. The legislation of this House proves it: the one portion voting in favor, and the other portion voting against the appropriations of public revenue for sectional and local objects. Sir, a stranger in the lobby would soon discover this fact. The able report of the Committee of Ways and Means, in 1828, establishes the proposition conclusively. The reasoning of that committee in proof of the unequal operation of our revenue system, has not, and, in my opinion, cannot be shaken. Sir, if the duties on imports were paid equally by all parts of the country, why do we see so many propositions from certain quarters to distribute the national revenue among the several States. If no State is to receive more than she has paid, why this anxiety on the subject? Why not suffer the money to remain with the people, and be drawn for these local purposes by the local Legislature? This disposition to create a common fund, and to distribute it according to numbers, proves the inequality of the contributions to the public revenue. It proves that a minority pay the money, and that the majority are determined to go into joint stock with them, and to wring from them the last possible farthing.

Mr. L. said, as a representative of a new State, he would present another reason for opposing the resolution. So soon, sir, as the new States begin to yield the old States an annual revenue for the opening of roads and canals, and the establishment of schools, they will be viewed as so many plantations, furnishing a regular income to their owners. The sympathies of the old States would be lost in the stronger feeling of cupidity; exactions upon exactions would follow in the sale and disposition of the public lands; and a system, which is now very oppressive, would be rendered more so by the combined efforts of the old States. Every demagogue would minister to the public appetite by some new scheme to draw from the new States a higher price for their lands. This condition of things, besides its absolute degradation, would check in an instant the prosperity and growth of the new States. Sir, as soon as the new States put their seal to this proposition, they add to the number of their taskmasters in the proportion of sixteen to one. Their destinies are then fixed. It is, sir, nothing short of a proposition to place them in the wine press, and to squeeze from them every possible drop of vitality which could minister to the prosperity of the older States.

Mr. BURGESS next rose to address the House; but the hour having elapsed, the debate was closed for this day.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 8, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th ultimo, concerning a distribution of the public lands among the several States. The question being on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN to amend the same.

Mr. BURGESS rose, and addressed the House at considerable length in support of the original resolution, and in opposition to the amendment. The hour allotted for the discussion of resolutions elapsed before Mr. B. had concluded his remarks.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1830.

SOUTHERN INDIANS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the memorial heretofore presented by him, and then laid on the table, from a meeting of citizens of New York, praying the interposition of the General Government to protect the Southern Indians from injustice and oppression, be now referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, rose, and said, that, disclaiming all intention of opposing the reference proposed, he would, however, question the propriety of entertaining every petition or memorial which may be addressed to Congress, whether it be the result of an accidental meeting at a grog shop or not. It appeared to him to be a perfectly useless waste of the time of the House, to order a reference of the memorial in question to the Committee on Indian Affairs, in as much as the subject matter of the memorial was generally and fully presented to Congress by the President's message, and was by an order of this House referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Mr. T. said, he did not wish to provoke discussion upon the subject alluded to, because that was not the proper stage for its discussion. He was, however, prepared to meet the question then and at all times.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, said he had waited to see whether the mover of the memorial, or some other gentleman, would rise and repel the allusions of the gentleman who had just sat down. Since this had not been done, he felt himself called upon to speak as a representative of the State from which the memorial emanated. This was not the result of "a meeting in a grog shop," as had been so unjustly insinuated, but one of the utmost respectability, and held in an enlightened and moral community. The chairman of that meeting was a Revolutionary officer, known, respected, and beloved. Mr. S. said he knew many of the individuals whose names were attached to the memorial, and he knew their standing to be of the most respectable character; and the doctrine which had been here advanced, that they ought not to be heard—that their respectful memorial ought not to be received by this House, was one which he had not expected to hear advanced, and against which he must enter his solemn protest. The language of the memorial was decorous and respectful. It was true it was upon a delicate as well as an important subject; but, however unfashionable the doctrines which it advocated were upon this floor, or however much they might clash with his own sentiments, or those of others, it was not to be submitted to, that the respectable memorialists should be refused to be heard. He hoped, therefore, that the memorial would have its appropriate reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and meet with that consideration and respectful treatment to which it was entitled.

Southern Indians.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, said, in as much as the memorial had been laid upon the table, at his request, a few days since, for the purpose of giving time to examine its contents, it might be expected of him to say a word or two on the subject. Without professing any particular skill in the signs of the times, it seemed to him, from movements in that House and elsewhere, that the question of our Indian policy was destined to create much feeling and discussion. He did not mean to say that party feeling would mingle with their deliberations, though he feared they would not be entirely free from it.

He rose, not to express, in advance, opinions upon matters of high moment, worthy of grave deliberation; nor should he oppose the reference of this memorial, however objectionable he considered its language. It did not become him, as one of the representatives of a State interested in this question, to manifest any undue degree of sensitiveness to the terms in which the memorialists had been pleased to express their sentiments. But it might not be improper for him to offer a few words by way of comment.

The memorial appeared to have two objects. One was to remonstrate against the opinions of the present Chief Magistrate, in regard to the Indian tribes. The other to stigmatize the legislation of particular States. He did not understand, from reading the memorial, that the memorialists complained of any injury or injustice to themselves. The suggestion was, that other persons, not citizens of the United States, have reason to apprehend evil from the course pursued towards them by the President and some of the States. Now, sir, [said Mr. W.] when any one is injured, it is time enough to complain; and it is well enough, usually, to let those who are injured complain for themselves. For though it has been said by a great moralist that the fate of complaint is to excite contempt rather than pity, no one has been persuaded by the adage to suffer and be silent.

Whence, then, the necessity of the petitioners' interference? Might they not be told that every one was ready enough to detail his own grievances? Was it less true now than formerly, that, if every body would take care of themselves, and of their own business, every body and every body's business would be well taken care of? Give me leave, sir, [said Mr. W.] to ask why, according to their own statement, these petitioners came before this House? They set forth no grievance of their own or of their fellow-citizens. They suggest no remedy resting in the action of this House for the real or imaginary grievances of others. Why may we not as well entertain supplications in behalf of the suffering people of Ireland or Hindostan? In what character, he inquired, did the memorialists present themselves? Was it as self-constituted guardians of the public faith? Were they voluntary superintendents of the treaty making power? Curators by assumption of the persons and property of the Southern Indians? or censors—he knew not by what right—of the Legislatures of sovereign States of the Union?

Taking their own showing, they applied to us, because the President refused to recognise the sovereignty and independence of some savage tribes; and because certain States, within whose territory they were at present found, contemplated extending their laws over all persons included in their constitutional and chartered limits.

And what then, sir, [continued Mr. W.] If these barbarous hordes are indeed sovereign powers, it belongs exclusively to the President to regulate the diplomatic intercourse with them. If an ambassador acceptable to the Cherokees should be required, the deep learning of the memorialists in the law of nations, he trusted, would not be overlooked. But at present it was the pleasure of the President only to maintain an agent near the new Government.

If the Executive should refuse to receive an embassy from the king of the gypsies, were we to entertain an appeal from his decision? And yet Meg Merillies might be almost as interesting a personage on canvas as Pocahontas.

If the British Parliament will persist in legislating for that amiable and oppressed race of vagrants, or the Legislature of New York will pass laws to regulate the Brothertown or other Indians, have we any cognizance of the matter? If the faith of treaties is about to be violated, it is the duty of the President to see that it be preserved; and, if he fail, it is our duty to impeach him. Is any such measure prayed for or intended? If the laws of the United States should be broken, the courts of the United States, he presumed, would be ready to afford redress. Is there any danger that they would decline jurisdiction? If, on the other hand, these Indians are alien infidel subjects, the remnants of a conquered people, under the protection of the States within whose jurisdiction they reside, does it not belong to the States to regulate them as the public good may require? Have we a veto upon their legislation?

Have gentlemen considered what legislative act they can ground upon this memorial, taking it, fact and argument together, as far as any one who professes to understand the subject can or will receive it? What is the relief sought, and how are they to administer it? What is the prescription? Sir, [said Mr. W.] I am not apprised that our interference is at all called for by any exigency. I do not perceive that the memorialists have made out their case either as patrons or clients. This kind officiousness in the affairs of our neighbors, [continued Mr. W.] by which we exhibit our benevolence at their expense, is a great and growing evil. Gentlemen from all quarters of the country have taken so much care of us, that they have scarcely left us any thing at all to care for.

These everlasting political homilies—this mawkish mixture of sentiment and selfishness—this rage for instructing all the world in their appropriate duties, was to him at once ridiculous and disgusting. Let the painter stick to his pallet, and the sculptor to his chisel. Sir, I mean no disrespect to the chairman of the meeting. I voted for his pictures, sir, but I cannot vote for his petition. We want no more artists to encumber our capitol with Indian caricatures. Our walls already bear witness to their works.

Sir, [continued Mr. W.] I had not intended to say so much. The sum of the matter seemed to him to be this: it had pleased these memorialists, in their wisdom, to censure the President, to reproach certain legislative bodies, and to show forth their own logic, rhetoric, and philanthropy. Having effected these important objects, he presumed this specimen of their learning and eloquence might be consigned to oblivion without injury to the republic.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said he did not rise to enter into the discussion of any matter connected with the question of the policy which this Government should pursue towards the Indians. He wished, however, to express his regret that, upon a mere question of reference, any thing should be said by gentlemen from any quarter, tending to call forth a discussion, which was premature, which could result in no good, and for which the House could not then be prepared. Mr. B. said, he had not availed himself of the privilege of examining the language of the memorial for himself, but he had learned from others, who had done so, that it was not of such a character as to exclude it from the House; he could, therefore, see no good objection to its reference to the proposed committee, and he hoped it would be so referred without further argument. He concurred with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER] that the subject referred to by the memorial was one of great delicacy and importance. It was necessary that this House should come to a decision upon some of the questions, presented by the present condition of the Indians, at this session of Congress. The whole subject would shortly be presented to the House by the committee which had it in charge; and when, in this way, some distinct proposition was presented, gentlemen would have ample opportunity of expressing their views upon whatever side of the question they might feel it their duty to array themselves. As an individual member of the House, and looking to the necessity of forming some opinion upon the subject to which the memorial related, he was pleased that all the information, in the power either of individuals or public meetings to give, should, in some shape, be brought to the notice of the House. He would not object to memorials, that they contained nothing more than expression of feeling in relation to this subject; but he was particularly gratified with the presentation of memorials coming from a source so respectable and enlightened, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPENCER] had assured us this one had come. He trusted it contained some original matter, some new views upon a question of so much importance. As a member of the committee which had this subject under consideration, he would feel obliged by the reference of as many such memorials as might be presented from any quarter.

Mr. B. again expressed a hope that any argument upon the subject of our Indian affairs might be withheld until it should be fairly before the House.

Mr. DRAYTON, of South Carolina, said, the sole ground upon which he opposed the commitment of this memorial was the language in which it was couched. The memorialists, in common with other citizens, [said Mr. D.] have the constitutional right to petition Congress for the redress of grievances. As they possess the right, it is for them to decide what are the proper occasions for its exercise. The only limitation which has been, and which, in my judgment, ought to be imposed upon those who address the Legislature, is, that their language should not be indecent or disrespectful. But this memorial so plainly offends against decorum, that we should, it appears to me, be wanting in what is due to ourselves and to those whom we represent, were we to permit it to be referred to any committee of the House. Having taken it up within a few minutes, I have not been able to peruse it entirely. I have glanced over it, so as to collect its object—the temper of its framers—the general scope of their reasoning, and the conclusions at which they have arrived. Although the proposed object of the paper is to demonstrate that to the Indians, rightfully, belong the territories which they occupy, yet it is evident that the real intent of those who subscribed it is to show that the State of Georgia, in her conduct towards the Cherokees, has committed an infraction of the constitution, and departed from the obligations imposed upon her by treaties and by the principles of justice and humanity. The memorialists “call the attention of Congress to the relations which have always existed between Georgia and the Creek and the Cherokee nation of Indians. Treaties [they state] were repeatedly made between the colony of Georgia and Indian nations residing, &c. &c., and always upon the ground of the distinct national character of the Indians,” and of their right of soil and “of sovereignty within their national limits.” Reference is then made to treaties between Georgia and the Cherokees, upon the same basis, since she became an independent State, “which are binding upon her, in honor, law, and conscience.” It is a fact of which none of us are ignorant, that the Legislature of Georgia passed a law before the date of this memorial, directing, at a future period, a division of some of the lands of the Cherokees, (considered to have been ceded to the State by treaty,) and declaring that the laws of Georgia, after a certain time, should be binding upon the Cherokees within her limits. Of the propriety or impropriety of this legislation, I shall not now speak. I have noticed it merely to show the application to the State of Georgia of the following passages:

“Your memorialists cannot avoid the conclusion that the bringing of State laws to bear upon the Cherokees without their consent, or the division of their lands among the citizens of any State, would bring great and lasting disgrace upon our country, and would expose us as a people to the judgment of Heaven.” Congress is then implored to interpose, in order that our national character may be preserved “from so indelible a stigma, and is solemnly invoked, by that abhorrence which every upright legislator will feel at the suggestion of measures that will rest upon the brute force, by the apprehension of Divine displeasure, &c., by all these considerations to interpose and save the Cherokees from such injustice and oppression as can hardly fail of accomplishing our ruin, and of bringing opprobrium and perpetual shame upon our country.” Sir, no one can doubt, for a single moment, that the passages which I have extracted from this memorial, directly and unequivocally charge one of our sister States with trampling upon all laws, human and divine, under the instigation of the most foul and criminal motives—with the perpetration of deeds which ought to excite the abhorrence and execration of civilized man, and call down the malediction and vengeance of an offended Deity. Can petitions for the redress of grievances not be preferred, without abuse and crimination? I do not attempt to take away, or in the slightest degree to impair, the right of petitioning Congress. All I require is, that this right should be so exercised as not to be diverted from its true intention by grossness and abuse; with this limitation, the right will be preserved, without being degraded. We ought surely to pay as much respect to a sovereign confederated State, as to an individual; and would any member of this body feel himself authorized to present the memorial of an individual, containing such language as I have quoted? The questions involved in this memorial are of momentous interest. I have reflected upon them sufficiently to convince me of their complexity and their delicacy. However embarrassing they may be, we shall be compelled to examine into, and to decide upon, them. I do not desire to postpone their consideration. All I desire is, that a constitutional right should not be converted into a vehicle for opprobrious epithets, and that the Legislature should not lend its aid to the circulation of what grossly violates common propriety and common decency. With this view, Mr. D. moved that the memorial be laid upon the table. He, however, withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. LUMPKIN, of Georgia, who acknowledged (for it was known to all his acquaintance) that he was sufficiently sensitive upon subjects relating to himself; and it was known to this House that he was equally so upon all subjects relating to the rights, honor, and character of the people and State which he had the honor in part to represent. Moreover, he believed he had not one constituent who would suspect him of being deficient in zeal and fidelity upon all subjects relating to their interest. Nevertheless he must express his deep regret that this memorial, emanating from a few enthusiastic citizens of New York, was not permitted to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs without opposition, and thereby have prevented this premature discussion. He regretted the motion of his colleague (at the time it was made) to lay this paper on the table, because, if it had been permitted to go to the committee, we should have avoided this untimely consumption of time, and premature excitement of feeling, upon a subject of deep and grave importance, not only to Georgia, but to the whole Union.

Mr. L. said, that, for two years past, by day and by night, in sickness and in health, he had used his best efforts to get the Indian subject in a general and digested form before this House. The records and proceedings in this House would bear him out in saying that the general plan for Indian emigration, now under the consideration of Congress, had been repeatedly urged by him [Mr. L.] for two years past; and he would now take the liberty of saying that one of the greatest obstacles which had impeded his progress, and, as he believed, his success, might be traced in the disposition in this House prematurely to enter upon the discussion of the Indian subject.

Southern Indians.

It is known to this House that the whole subject of our Indian relations has been brought before Congress by the President of the United States in his message at the commencement of the present session; and has been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, of which he was a member; and, therefore, he felt himself justified in saying that that committee is and has been assiduous in labor and industry, in endeavoring to perform the important duties confided to its charge. He, therefore, regretted, that any portion of the delegation from Georgia, or any other member of the House, should subject themselves to the imputation of stifling the most full, free, and ample investigation upon this subject, in all its various bearings. As regards the paper which has given rise to this discussion, his views coincided with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. DRAYTON] and that of his colleagues. He considered this officious act of the petitioners (to speak in the mildest terms of it) as an impertinent intermeddling with other people's concerns. But, sir, [said Mr. L.] I would most gladly hear and carefully examine all that can be said by every individual in this Union who thinks with these memorialists, including all the William Penns of the whole land. I want the whole subject fully and fairly before Congress. Sir, I am not vain in believing that the conduct of Georgia, in relation to the Indians, in the prosecution of her rights, will not only be justified to this House, but to nine-tenths of the people of this Union, if we can have an ample discussion upon the subject in all its bearings. Instead of a Georgia question, in relation to Indians, I wish to present to the consideration of Congress, and the people of the Union, a systematic plan and policy in relation to the Indians, which shall not only relieve my own State, but every other State and territory in the Union, of their present perplexities in relation to the rights of the States—the rights of the Indians, as well as the rights of this Government, in relation to this Indian subject. Sir, it is time to have a definite policy upon this subject. The jurisdiction of all the conflicting parties must be defined. Your committee, upon this subject, are using their best exertions to lay before you all the facts which they can collect, connected with the subject, and which are calculated to aid in arriving at a just decision. I, therefore, do hope we shall not again suffer ourselves to be excited into a premature discussion of this subject, by those whose ignorance of the subject is the manifest cause of their zeal and forwardness.

Mr. SPENCER said, he owed it to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DRAYTON] to explain some of his former observations. When he [Mr. S.] was up before, he had said the memorial was, in his opinion, couched in decorous language. He meant, it was respectful towards that House, and he believed that was the question to be decided. Mr. S. said, that, so far from wishing for discussion on this subject, he really deplored it; and he appealed to the gentlemen from Georgia to bear him out in the assertion, that he had requested of them to let the memorial go to the committee without opposition, and consequently without a painful debate. It was a discussion which he had avoided as much as was in his power, consistent with his duty to vindicate the character of the memorialists, which had been so unwarrantably aspersed. He said the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DRAYTON] had read a clause in the memorial, which he considered indecorous. He would ask if the memorialists—he would ask if any of the free citizens of this Union, had not the right to express their opinions upon any subject of national importance to this House? Whether they are right or not [said Mr. S.] in the opinions which they advance, still they cannot be debarred the right of respectfully expressing those opinions to their representatives. Mr. S. said the time had not yet come for the inquiry whether these memorialists were right in their sentiments. When the time does come [said he] for that discussion, it must be approached with awe. It is one of great magnitude, and must involve the most solemn considerations. The only question now for us to decide is, whether the memorial is a respectful one in relation to this House, and if it was not, he had perhaps contributed to mislead the House, in as much as he had expressed a contrary opinion. Is it [said Mr. S.] indecorous for a portion of the people to express their sentiments freely on any subject they may think proper to bring before us, or which may already be before us? If so, [said Mr. S.] there might be some ground for the opposition to the reference; otherwise no such ground could exist. In relation to the memorial itself, and the condition of the Southern Indians, [said Mr. S.] there at least appeared some color for complaint; if it was true, as stated, that, in the proceedings of judicial tribunals, an Indian's oath was not allowed against a white man, whilst that of a white man was valid against an Indian. Mr. S. concluded by enforcing the right which he contended petitioners and memorialists had to be heard upon that floor; and said, when he had stated that the memorial was not an indecorous one, he only referred to its relation to that House.

Mr. WAYNE said, he was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. DRAYTON] and he should vote with him on the present question. He took this occasion to return his thanks to that gentleman for the stand which he had taken, in making his motion to lay the subject on the table; and he should have done so himself, had it not more properly devolved upon an older member of that body. He hoped the memorial might be read, that gentlemen might judge for themselves, whether it was couched in decorous terms. He therefore moved its reading.

[The reading of the memorial at length, by the Clerk of the House, here took place.]

Mr. MALLARY observed that he was not aware that difficulties could ensue upon the subject before them. A great number of respectable citizens had memorialized Congress on a very important subject. It had been said by the gentleman from Georgia, that it would be much better if persons, instead of taking care of the business of others, would attend to their own affairs. But what [said he] are to be considered as our affairs, and what are the affairs of the nation? Has not the President of the United States himself recommended, in his message, the subject to the consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs? And why, therefore, should objections be raised to the reference of it to that committee, by those who laid claim to the character of genuine republicans? Mr. M. proceeded to contend in favor of the memorialists to admonish, if he might use the term, the members of the National Legislature upon the subject of any public measure in contemplation, and also to express their opinion as to what might be the probable consequences or results of their decision. He thought that the citizens of the United States, under such circumstances, had the right not only to express their opinions, but also to urge their arguments in support of such opinions.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, said, he certainly did not rise with a few to prolong the debate. On the contrary, it was with extreme regret that he had seen that debate take the range which it had already done. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPENCER] had seemed to intend to fix on him [Mr. T.] the charge of having not only unnecessarily provoked debate upon the merits of the subject referred to in the memorial, but of having done injustice to the memorialists. Mr. T. disclaimed having said, or intended to say, any thing (when he first addressed the House) on the merits of the important subject referred to in the memorial. He had read that paper, and, as a representative of the people of Georgia, he felt indignant at the insult apparently intended to be offered by the memorialists to that State. He repeated what he said when he addressed the House before, that he had no intention of opposing the proposed reference. That he had implicit confidence in the integrity and intelligence of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who already had the subject under consideration. That he had the fullest confidence in this House, and in the American people, as well as in the perfect fairness of the claims of Georgia, and that, therefore, he did not fear the result. Mr. T. said, that, but for the assertion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER] that the memorialists are gentlemen of respectability, the ungenerous, illiberal and indecorous language used by them towards Georgia would justify the belief that the memorial was the result of an accidental meeting at a grog-shop. Mr. T. said, he was a Georgian, and had the honor to be one of the representatives of the people of that State. He asked the gentleman from New York, therefore, if it were possible that an apology could be expected from him. Mr. T. repeated what he said when he first addressed the House, that a reference of the memorial in question was superseded by a submission of the subject at large to the Committee on Indian Affairs, through the President's message; and he would now add that the vast accumulation of trash which appeared in the columns of the National Intelligencer over the signature of William Penn, and circulated through the United States during the last summer, did away any necessity which ever in the conception of the memorialists might have otherwise devolved upon the people of New York to take the Indians located in Georgia under their special care and protection: for, if gentlemen would take the trouble to compare the memorial with the essays before alluded to, they would find that the memorialists have consulted their convenience, by taking such parts of the arguments used by William Penn as are the least profound, and, therefore, the least troublesome to the intellects of the memorialists. But with what grace [Mr. T. asked] do complaints against Georgia come from the land of the Mohawks, the Norridgewocks, the Pequods, and Narragansetts? Mr. T. said, the gentleman from the North [Mr. MALLARY] had taken exceptions to the maxim that "if every body would attend to their own business and let others alone, every body's business would be well attended to," as quoted by Mr. T.'s colleague, [Mr. WILDE.] Mr. T. asked how the gentleman from Vermont would like a substitution of the maxim, "Physician, heal thyself." He deprecated the idea, in conclusion, that his intention had been either to provoke discussion, or opposed the proposed reference, and expressed a hope that the discussion would for the present be discontinued.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said that no one could deny that the subject matter of the memorial pertained to the business of the House. The President had called the subject to the notice of Congress at the commencement of the session, and invited the special attention of the House to it. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, at the head of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. BELL] had also invited its reference to that committee as a matter to be properly disposed of in that way. If the memorial was, therefore, on a subject pending here, he [Mr. S.] could not discover, as clearly as some gentlemen seemed to, how that which was of such interest to the whole country should not have been a proper subject of petition to this House from these memorialists as well as any body else. It was said, however, that the language of it was indecorous to the State of Georgia. He did not understand it to be objected to the memorial that it was at all disrespectful to the House—but it was said that it was not to be treated here with favor, because it imputed to other persons motives or conduct calculated to bring them into disrepute. Now, sir, [said Mr. S.] it becomes us to remember, here, that this right of petition has been deemed so sacred that its security has been provided for in the constitution itself. It is a right to be tenderly dealt with. This petition is not addressed to "His Most Sacred Majesty," or laid at the foot of a throne. The memorialists are our own constituents—the free people of this country—and addressing us, their own representatives. It is their right to speak to us—and to speak their opinions frankly and fearlessly, and it is our duty to listen to them respectfully. We can only require, on the other hand, that they speak in respectful terms of this House. Beyond that, I doubt if we have any moral right to inquire. If we undertake to criticise the language of these appeals from our constituents to this House beyond that point, we may overstep our own limits, and, under the notion of repudiating their petitions as disrespectful, we may in fact abridge the right of the people to petition their own representatives. If we are now to deny to these petitioners a respectful notice of their complaints, because they are supposed to have spoken of one of the States in terms which that State might consider offensive, why should not we at least set up the same rule for other departments of our own Government? We should then realize more distinctly the nature of the principle we have heard advanced in this debate. If our constituents were to petition us for an impeachment of the Executive or the judges of the court, and charge them with injustice, oppression, and usurpation, in unlimited terms, should we repudiate their complaints, because we might be disposed to feel a tenderness for these high functionaries? If they speak respectfully of this House, it is all which we have a right to require for ourselves. I will not say whether, if this petition was presented to the Legislature of Georgia, it should be considered so respectful to that State, as to entitle it to favorable notice there. Georgia would determine that for herself. But it is enough for us that it contains no imputations on this House. Whether the conclusions which the petitioners have drawn from their own views of the subject, to which they call our attention, are just or not, is not the question at this time. But it is a question on which we may be called at this session to act as their representatives: and, as they have the right, as our constituents, to be heard on any question here, which in their opinion may affect the interests or the character of the country, we are bound to treat their complaints with great respect. If we are to err at all on so delicate a point as the right of petition involves, we had better err on the other side. Mr. S. then proceeded to examine the passages which had been alluded to as particularly disrespectful to the State of Georgia, and said that he considered the terms used as founded entirely on the hypothetical correctness of the conclusions which the petitioners had drawn from the documents to which they referred. But whether these terms were in any sense disrespectful to that State or not, he did not admit the right of the House to determine for the petitioners. If they treated the House itself with respect, it was all that the House had any right to require of them.

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, said it was little matter how much gentlemen may deplore the agitation and discussion of this question. They had got into it, and it was impossible for them to retreat. They might as well encounter it first as last. We have heard much [said Mr. F.] on the constitutional impossibility of refusing to listen to this memorial, or rather argument, for he was in favor of calling things by their right names. Gentlemen were mistaken in the name which had been given to the instrument before them; but the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MALLARY] had explained the whole matter. The paper is sent here, not only as a petition or memorial, but as an argument in opposition to the views expressed by the President on this subject, in his last message to the House. For his own part, he, in common with others, had full confidence in the Committee on Indian Affairs; and he did not oppose the reference of the subject to them; but he was desirous of stripping it of its fictitious character. The many delicate terms made use of in the paper, in relation to the State of Georgia, and its policy, were sufficient indications of the motives which prompted it. It had become fashionable [he said] to lavish abuse upon Georgia and its policy, both in the newspapers and in popular assemblies, and she was now considered fair game—a fair mark for all the shafts of ribaldry; but he could say of that State, in the language of a distinguished individual on another occasion, the policy of Georgia “would stand the scrutiny of talents and of time.” The paper referred especially to the conduct of Georgia; the conduct of the sovereign State of Georgia, (he was glad to see that term had become more fashionable lately than it was two or three years ago,) in her internal relations—and contains threats of the vengeance of Heaven against her. Mr. F. said, if it was desirable that the sentiments contained in this document should come before this House, the gentlemen who advocated it could express them there without referring them to the committee. He said the weakest member from New York could enforce those sentiments as strongly as they were set forth in the document in question. Mr. F. here referred to the condition in which other States stood upon this subject; and said, if this sort of investigation was proper in relation to one State, it was equally applicable to others. But what [said he] would be thought of the citizens of Georgia, should they call upon New York to make restitution to the Indian tribes who once resided within her territory? The doctrine would be considered as monstrous; but now [said Mr. F.] that the memorialists reside in the great commercial emporium, they are entitled to all deferential consideration; and it is matter of surprise that their right to interfere in the matter is questioned. Mr. F. concluded by repeating his dissent from opinions expressed in that House on the subject of the memorial.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that, as this debate was on a mere question of reference, and as the House would probably not object to the reference, he hoped the debate would not be continued. The President had called the attention of Congress to the subject; but the House seemed prematurely and rapidly approaching an Indian war on this preliminary and unimportant question. He hoped Mr. DRAVOT would not press his motion, but permit the question to be taken on the reference.

Mr. ARCHER feared that this question would produce a feeling in the House, mischievous, and prejudicial to the performance of the public business. He agreed with Mr. CAMBRELENG on the subject, but would say a word or two on the question which had been debated. It was said the memorial contained language disrespectful towards one of the States of the Union. He confessed he did not perceive it. He had read the petition, and did not find any thing disrespectful; and he quoted the language deemed exceptionable, to show that it was so. The memorial spoke merely of a hypothetical course of measures on the part of Georgia, which would lead to certain consequences, which the petitioners deemed grievous, and to be deprecated. It was the right of all men—not merely freemen, but all men, [said Mr. A.] to express their fears of what would grow out of an apprehended course of public measures.

This was a memorial of a respectable meeting of citizens—on what sort of a subject? Why, relative to Indian affairs. It would be their just right—no one would deny it—to address us on any of our foreign affairs; [said Mr. A.] and should we think of meting out to them the ardor with which they should express themselves to us on that subject, or any other subject of public concern? He put it to the gentlemen of Georgia themselves, whether there was any part of the Union where the people would brook such an assumption by this House, if it were attempted in regard to a memorial from their own State. They were the last people in the Union by whom ardor of language on public topics should be rebuked. Mr. A. concluded by saying that if the gentleman from South Carolina should press his motion to lay the memorial on the table, he, [Mr. A.] though a Southern man himself, must object to it, and favor the reference of the petition.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that, if the discussion upon the matter were further prolonged, it was obvious that the presentation of petitions on the part of the States which had not yet been called over by the Speaker, must be deferred until Monday next, and thus a week's time be lost to the petitioners. He saw no prospect of utility from a continuation of the debate in the present stage of the affair; and he should therefore move the previous question.

The motion was sustained; and the main question recurred as to referring the memorial to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Upon this Mr. REED asked for the yeas and nays; but the call was not sustained, and the question was, upon a division, carried in the affirmative.

So the memorial was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House again resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th December ultimo.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN, on the same day, to amend the same.

Mr. BURGESS, of Rhode Island, resumed the remarks interrupted by the last adjournment. He had not concluded when the hour allotted to the consideration of resolutions had expired.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th of December ultimo, concerning a distribution of the public lands among the several States.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN, on the same day, to amend the said resolution.

Mr. BURGESS resumed, and concluded his remarks. [The remarks of Mr. B. as delivered on three several days, follow:]

Mr. BURGESS said, that whatever might aid education and extend intercourse among the people throughout the various parts of the country, always did, when brought to the consideration of the House, appear before its members attended by circumstances of deep and vital importance. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HUNT] proposed to give such appropriation to some portion of the national funds, as would facilitate the operations of both these sources of national improvement. However desirous I may be to aid this proposition, [said Mr. B.] yet, feeling myself within the interdiction of that rebuke so graciously bestowed on a gentleman whose State had ceded no lands to the Union, I shall, first of all, offer some reasons why a representative from such a State may be permitted to mingle in any debate concerning a disposition of the public lands. It is true, Rhode Island neither did nor could, in the great revolutionary conflict, make any cession of broad lands or more extensive claims, in aid of the war, or of the confederation. The great founder of that State was able to find no longer space than its very limited territory, wherein, for the first time, among all the kingdoms and colonies of this world, a Christian man might, at that time, obtain full permission "to hold forth a lively experiment, that a civil State could best stand and flourish, with the utmost freedom, in religious concerns." Although Rhode Island could not do what more fortunate conditions enabled other States so liberally to perform, yet, in every great passage of arms, and in all which might illustrate patriotism or signalize valor, she stood in the very first rank of devotedness and achievement. History will continue to do justice to all the efforts of all the States in their revolutionary contest. Should it ever be otherwise, and the North become oblivious of these things, the honor and magnanimity of the South will not suffer them to be forgotten.

The lands comprehended in the resolution have been acquired by disbursements from the common funds of the nation. The history of your finances will disclose the several amounts contributed to these funds by the several States. New Orleans is the great port of entry for nearly the whole valley of the Mississippi. Since Louisiana became a part of the United States, and up to the year 1826, about fifteen millions of dollars have been paid into the United States' Treasury by the collector of that district. If all the goods on which this revenue was collected were consumed in the States on the right and left banks of the great river, the division of this amount among those States will show, for twenty-three years, their several contributions to the national funds. Averaged upon the whole nine, the annual amount of each is about sixty thousand dollars. The little State of Rhode Island has, yearly, ever since becoming a member of this Union, contributed not less than four times that amount. If it be contended that those States have paid more, because they have consumed large amounts of commodities, brought coastwise to New Orleans, or over land from Atlantic ports, it may be replied that Rhode Island has likewise paid more, by consuming goods brought into that State by the same kind of trade. If this statement do not give an accurate view of the relative contributions of these States to the national funds, it will give, what it was intended to give, something like a sufficient reason for permitting Rhode Island to be heard on any question concerning lands acquired or purchased at the national cost.

Neither the patriotism or the efforts of other States is drawn into question. In the revolution each of the "old thirteen" did all which courage could dare, liberality contribute, or unwearied labor perform. The new States, had they at that time been in existence, would not have deserted the cause, or dishonored the generous stock from which they are descended. Could the patriotism of our days be warmed by the spirit of those times, and every lip be purified by fire from the hallowed altar of the revolution, this debate might receive a new character; and in the generous strife for the general welfare, each State, not unmindful of our high character in former times, would struggle for pre-eminence in liberality of contribution. With as much of these feelings and principles as I can bring myself, and as much as I can invoke to my aid from others, I ask for the indulgence of this House while I go into some consideration of this amendment.

It may not be in order to consider the resolution itself, unless it can first be demonstrated that the amendment, if it prevail, will, in effect, destroy this resolution. If that can be evinced, then every argument in support of the resolution will be an argument against the amendment.

The resolution proposes "That a select committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the nett annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States and territories, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives." It is moved by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MARTIN] to amend this resolution, so that the committee should further inquire "into the amount and value of the public lands which have been given by Congress to any State, or to any public institution in said State." The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TEST] has, in debate on this subject, announced his intention to move an amendment of this amendment, should it prevail, to the intent that the same committee may further inquire, and report to this House, the whole amount expended for national purposes in all the other States.

Now, sir, can any proposition be contrived, more effectually calculated to subvert and destroy this resolution, than those contained in these proposed amendments? If the first prevail, the second will be offered; and, if justice govern the decisions of this House, it will as certainly be adopted. With these two amendments incorporated into this resolution, what Representatives, from what States, will be disposed to vote for it? Under the first branch of the amendment, your committee would be charged to inquire what quantity of public lands, and what amount of money, have, at any time, been granted to any of the new States. These must comprehend the reservations, whether of sections or townships, for primary, academical, or collegiate education; the grants, at various periods, for roads and canals; the expenditures for improving the navigation of rivers, together with the whole amount disbursed, during almost thirty years, on the great national highway from the Atlantic waters far into the Western States. If true to the principles of justice, and to the interests of the United States, though forgetful of their own, the gentlemen from the Western States can never vote for this resolution, so amended, as to induce a report upon such inquiries. Such a vote will acknowledge those States to be accountable for those grants and expenditures; and that their several portions of them ought to be charged upon their several annual dividends arising from the sales of public lands under the system proposed by this resolution. It can never be expected that men will ever be found in such hostility to their own interest, when uncalled to it by any great claims of justice. The representation from these States will, therefore, be found unanimous against the resolution, when thus amended.

The committee, under the second amendment, will look into all the old States. They must then take account of all expenditure, since the establishment of the Federal Government, made for national purposes. The items of this account will be all the numerous and heavy appropriations, from year to year, for clearing rivers and harbors; for the building of moles and breakwaters; for light-houses upon the whole coast; for custom-houses in every collection district; for armories, arsenals, fortifications, dock yards, and naval stations, together with all other the immense and necessary expenditures for land or maritime defence, on the whole Atlantic frontier. What gentleman, representing any of these States, will sit here, and by his consent sanction this inquiry? The very supposition is preposterous. If, therefore, the amendment moved by the gentleman from South Carolina, and that suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, are adopted, the resolution will never be passed by this House. Place them upon it, and, like the asp on the bosom of the Egyptian queen, they will bring death with their contact.

Under this view of the question, the whole subject of the resolution, with all the reasons for adopting it, are so many arguments for consideration in discussing the amendment. This resolution places before the House, as upon a great chart, the public lands, the extensive national domain. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TEST] has called our attention to a consideration of the manner of acquiring some parts of it. We are cautioned by him against appropriating these lands to any object which may come in conflict with the will of the donors, in their deeds of cession to the United States. Men may fairly differ concerning the pecuniary value of those cessions made by the several States; but no one, conversant with the history of our revolution, independence, and confederacy, can for a moment question their high and patriotic motives. Those motives ever have been, and always will, as I trust, be duly appreciated; nor shall any examination by me of the history and condition of those lands, either before or since their cession, deny to Virginia her merited pre-eminence in these deeds of devotedness to the union and interest of our common country.

We must not, however, imagine that the region covered by those cessions, and which is now separated into seven new States and two large territories, was, at the time of making them, any thing like so many millions of acres of fee simple, then in possession and at the disposal of the ceding States. Not a foot of all which is comprehended in those States, or in the proposed resolution, was then holden, or claimed to be holden, as land, as freehold, under any of its legal descriptions. The ceding States claimed, and they relinquished claims; but they neither claimed nor relinquished to the United States' fee simple. The House will excuse me if I go into some history of this subject, when it is observed that gentlemen discuss this question, as if the United States had acquired by this cession, and for no valuable consideration, a title to many hundred millions of acres, then held by certain of the several States quietly, and in the very highest degree of ownership.

History does not authorize us to say that the sovereigns of Europe ever claimed soil and freehold in the New World by right of discovery. Navigators and travellers in the employment of those sovereigns discovered the several parts of this continent for their respective princes; and they, under those discoveries, claimed all the rights, whatever they may be, so acquired, to their own use, and to the exclusion of all other people and potentates. These claims always recognised the rights of the aboriginal owners of the country; and, however incompatible with those rights any project of colonization in North America might have been, no European prince, either temporal or spiritual, ever denied them. No one of these princes ever attempted to plant colonies by force of conquest. They claimed, by virtue of discovery, the exclusive right to purchase the soil of the primitive owners. This was, then, precisely what is now called the right of pre-emption. The acquisition of fee simple, in this country, by conquest, papal proclamation, or royal charter, was unknown in the theory of North American colonization. The charters of those sovereigns might sometimes convey less, but they never conveyed more, than this right of pre-emption. Under such charters, and by the exercise of this right, American land titles in our country, whatever they may be, have been acquired.

It will be recollected that the first charter was granted to the London Company by the Sovereign of England for the settlement of Virginia. This covered all the lands from Old Point Comfort, two hundred miles south, and two hundred miles north; and thence, "west and north-west, to the Pacific Ocean." A charter for the settlement of New England was soon after granted to the Plymouth company, by the same power, and with still more extensive limits. It covered all the region, from the fortieth to the forty-eighth degree of north latitude, lying between the two great oceans which wash the shores of our continent. A subsequent charter, for settling the Southern States, was, in like manner, granted to another company. This extended, on the coast, from twenty-nine to thirty-six and a half degrees north latitude, and covers the whole region from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

The opinions of the geographers and voyagers of those days should not be forgotten. They regarded these continents as narrow belts of land, obstructing their course to the much richer regions of the eastern India. Every bay and inlet was explored; and they thrust their ships into them, expecting to shoot through into the great Pacific Ocean. The English monarchs, who granted, and the companies who received, these charters, could never have expected that the States formed under them would contain more territory than they, at this time, actually cover. Nor was it believed that the prerogative of the English crown had exhausted its power to grant new charters, within the grants to those companies. The great right of pre-emption, or power to treat with the Indians for the title to lands, might be resumed, whenever the interests of the crown, or the colonies, should require such resumption. On this principle, the charters of all the colonies west of Connecticut, and within the charter of New England, were afterwards granted.

While the English colonies were forming under these charters, the French monarch had pushed his discoveries and settlements from the Gulf of St. Lawrence, up the river, to Quebec and Montreal, and from New Orleans almost to the source of the Mississippi. The condition of things produced by these events, both in Europe and America, excited between France and England, and between the American colonies, the war of 1756. It is well known that France claimed not only the whole pre-emption right of the whole territory north and west of New England, but also that of the entire region between the high lands and the Mississippi, on the left bank of that river, from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. During that war, the famous family compact between the two great monarchs of the house of Bourbon was made, and brought to bear on the conflict.

The English colonies had a full view of this important controversy. They knew it involved the great question whether Englishmen should colonize and settle the whole region, from the Gulf of Mexico to Hudson's Bay, and from the ocean back to the fountains and stream of the Mississippi; or whether France and the colonists of France should be settled around throughout those extensive regions, and cut them off from the waters of the North and the West. Neither nation claimed the soil, except where colonies were established; but both did claim the right of discovery, pre-emption, and settlement. This great question of arms involved these claims and rights to one large part of the lands now under consideration; and the English colonies, making it a common cause with the mother country, sent into the field of conflict all their force and valor. It was a seven years' war, exhausting, bloody, and exterminating; for the colonies, on their part, contributed to it an army of twenty-five thousand men. All made their best and bravest efforts; but New England, never in arrears in the contribution of toil and blood, furnished full two-thirds of this army. The contest was terminated, the question for ever settled by the treaty of Paris, in 1763. The crown of France relinquished to the crown of England all her North American claims. This relinquishment comprehended the French claim, by discovery or otherwise, to the right of pre-emption, in all the region now covered by the limits of the seven States on the left bank and in the valley of the Mississippi, and the two territories between the lakes and that river.

It should be remembered that no settlements had, at this time, been made by the Atlantic colonies, so far north as the great lakes, or so far west as the ridge of the Appalachian mountains; nor had, or did any of them, under their charters, claim the right of pre-emption to any of the lands bounded by those lakes and the Mississippi, or watered by the streams falling from those mountains into that river. The right was then claimed by the crown of England, as the head and sovereign of the British empire. This fact is established by the proclamation of that monarch, made and given by him, in council, on the 7th of October, 1763. Among other extensive colonial provisions, it announces that, "whereas it is just and reasonable, and essential to our interest and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them or any of them, as their hunting grounds; we do, therefore, with the advice of our privy council, declare it to be our royal will and pleasure that no Governor or Commander in Chief, in any of our colonies or plantations in America, do presume for the present, and until our further pleasure be known, to grant warrant of survey, or pass patents for any lands beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the west or northwest, or upon any lands whatever, which, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, as aforesaid, are reserved to the said Indians, or any of them."

The rights claimed, and the rules promulgated by this proclamation, have never been questioned by any of the colonies. They demonstrate and lay before the world the great principle and laws of Indian relations with the whole English race, whether with the British crown, the colonies, or the United States; and that, too, from the first settlement in our country up to the present hour. From that time to the commencement of the revolutionary war, in 1775, many and grievous were the impositions and injuries committed by the English Government against the claims and rights of the thirteen colonies. These colonies lacked neither the vigilance to see, nor the ability and spirit to set down in order, and to expose to the English nation and to the world the whole inventory of those injuries and impositions. Examine the entire catalogue, and you will find that the American patriots of those times have not exhibited one allegation against the crown, on account of those claims contained in that proclamation. Colonial vigilance had never discovered in them any infringement of colonial rights.

The Atlantic States, in their struggle for existence with Great Britain, faced the enemy, and kept a steady eye on their powerful adversary. They did not, they could not, look to the West, until success gave some pause to the conflict. After the declaration of independence, after the capture of Burgoyne, and after the treaty of amity and defence with France, the Continental Congress were called, by the minister of that Power, then newly arrived in the United States, to deep and anxious consideration of the western boundary. That monarch, mindful of the Bourbon family compact of 1753, had contracted with his brother of Spain to conquer from Great Britain, by American arms, his claims to the western regions, relinquished by him in the treaty of Paris to the English crown; and, having thus obtained all his former rights under those claims, to transfer the whole territory to the Spanish monarch, and thus unite in that crown the jurisdiction, together with the right of pre-emption and settlement, to the whole valley of the Mississippi, from its source to the Gulf of Mexico.

It is true, the States within the letter of whose chartered limits this territory lay, had, before this time, moved their claims in their legislative deliberations; but this had ever been done with a patriotic view to ulterior measures in favor of the whole confederacy. In Congress it had been looked at as one of the results of a successful conflict with England. Without knowledge of the arrangement of France and Spain, ministers had been sent to both these Powers, to negotiate for aids in the war; but, at the same time, to claim for the United States the centre of the great river as their western boundary.

Among the States, the relinquishment of State claims to the western territory had, with some of them, become a sine qua non to the Union; and unless this was done, protests were entered against the articles of confederation. Congress, on the 6th September, 1780, "Resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to such of those States which have claims to the Western country, to pass such laws, and give their delegates in Congress such powers, as may remove the only obstacle to a final ratification of the articles of confederation." In furtherance of this object, Congress, on the 10th of the following October, "Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States; and be settled, and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States." These resolutions of Congress finally resulted in such measures in the several States "which had claims to the Western country," that all those claims, under certain reservations, have been by them ceded to the United States for the great objects of those resolutions.

Before these events, and while the war was in progress, the French minister had placed before Congress the right of his royal master to reconquer from the British crown the "Western country," for himself and the King of Spain, and had insisted on that right, because that country was a part of the British empire, and a fair subject of conquest. Congress replied, in a most able paper, said to have been drawn up by Mr. Madison, that France had, by the treaty of 1763, relinquished all right in that country to the British king, as the sovereign of the British empire in America, and to the use of his British subjects in America, and not to the use of such subjects in Europe. The United States had by the revolution succeeded to all those rights; and that, therefore, any claim of France or Spain to that country would not be a claim against Britain, their common enemy, but against the United States, their friend and ally. Notwithstanding the unanswerable force of these arguments, France and Spain persisted in their claims, and the Spanish court would not receive the American minister. In this condition of our affairs, so anxious were some of the States to obtain the aids expected from that monarch, and to secure, if possible, the independence of the United States, as then settled and limited, that Virginia, to induce Spain to come into our alliance, did, in the year 1780, instruct her delegates in Congress to procure an amendment of the instruction to Mr. Jay, directing him to relinquish the western boundary, and the right to navigate the Mississippi. France was unwearied in her efforts to procure a relinquishment, by the United States, to all claims to the Western country; and at last prevailed on Congress, in their final instructions to their ministers in Europe, to add, in reference to the French ministers, the following words: "And ultimately to govern yourselves by their advice and opinion." This clause was adopted by all the States, except Delaware, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. These States would vote for nothing which might impair our claims to the Western country, and the navigation of the Mississippi.

From these instructions, fortunately for this country, our ministers dared to depart. Had they concluded nothing without the knowledge of the King and ministers of France, and "ultimately been governed by their advice and opinion," the western boundary of the United States would have been fixed on the highest ridge of the Alleghany mountains; and the whole "Western country" again placed under the jurisdiction and control of the Bourbon family. The English Government, aware of this, and preferring us as neighbors to their northern colonies, let the fact be known to the American ministers; and Adams, Jay, and Franklin, without being governed by the advice and opinion of the royalty of France, first had and obtained, did immediately, with the English commissioners, make and execute a provisional treaty, not only acknowledging our independence, but establishing the great river as a western boundary. This event, when communicated by Dr. Franklin to the Count de Vergennes, produced his angry letter, disclosing, at once, the policy and intentions of France on the great boundary question; and the reply of Franklin evinced how far the American philosopher excelled the French courtier, not only in sound policy, but likewise in "a point of bienséance."

The House has been detained by this historical sketch, that a full demonstration might be placed before us, of the exact political condition of the "Western country," in relation, not only to the colonies, but also to the European powers, from the time when it was claimed by France, to the date of our definitive treaty with England, by which all claim to it was, as I trust, for ever relinquished by those powers to the United States. By this it appears that the whole claim was a claim to the right of pre-emption and settlement, whether vested in France, England, the colonies, or our whole nation; and it moreover appears that this claim, once vested in England, by the common consent, and to the use of all the colonies, afterwards devolved on them collectively by the revolution, and as a necessary appurtenance of independence, won by the common blood and treasure of them all. Within the limits defined by our treaty with Great Britain, all things whatever, which had theretofore been vested in the British crown, were, by our independence, ipso facto vested in the United States, to the sole use of the American people; and that treaty did neither more nor less than acknowledge that fact, and establish a solemn covenant between the parties, to govern themselves accordingly. The patriots of those times in each State not only acknowledged this great principle, but contended for it. The cessions of the several States never conveyed, and were never intended to convey, any right to the United States, not already vested in them. These cessions were nevertheless made upon great and patriotic considerations, worthy of the times, and the men who made them. They were each of them parts of a great system of accord and satisfaction, made and executed to strengthen the Union, by extinguishing for ever all State claims to the right of pre-emption and settlement in the "Western country," and thus leave the United States in the unquestionable exercise of all the rights, in that respect, acquired by our revolution and independence. The reservations made by any of the States do not controvert, but confirm, these principles. Provision for these had been made by Congress, in their resolution of October, 1780. Under the principle of that resolution, the ceding States might and did reserve so much interest in the territory so relinquished, as would cover any expenditure by them made upon it.

By the principles of the revolution, vested with the great right of pre-emption and settlement, and by the cessions of the several States, disencumbered of any conflicting claim, the United States have gone into the exercise of that right, for the common benefit of all the Union. They have by treaties, at various times, made with the Indians, the owners of the soil, purchased it of them for a valuable consideration, either in hand paid, or by annuities stipulated to be paid to them in coming years. By this process, the United States have changed what was, in 1783, in them a mere right of pre-emption into a clear and unquestionable title of soil and freehold throughout almost the whole of that extensive region, divided into seven States and two territories. Large tracts of these lands, so acquired, have been sold and conveyed to the people of those States and territories; and many grants made to them for public purposes, to encourage settlement, and thereby enhance the value of lands remaining unsold, as a common fund, and for the common benefit of the whole nation. These lands, so remaining, are one part of the subject now under consideration.

Another part of the national domain was obtained by purchase from Spain under what is commonly called the Florida treaty. It is pleasant to look back, and call up the course of events which put the nation in possession of the "Western country." This was the purchase of our first, and, I trust in God, it may be the pledge of our perpetual union. Every man in the nation paid his share of the price. We were united and equal in the toil and the success. In the name of justice, I wish we could so regard our acquisition of territory from Spain. That nation, stately and dilatory in every thing; slow even in her revenge; but magnificent in purpose, and just, when, having gone through all the forms, she arrives at the time of doing justice; that nation, I say, did ample justice to this; when, after years and years of delay, she remunerated our country for depredations committed by herself and her colonies, on property owned, and long claimed, by citizens of the United States. Justice, ample, magnificent justice was done by Spain in that treaty; but unfortunately it was done, not to those citizens claiming, and of right entitled to receive it. No, sir; it was done to the United States, the agents and trustees of those citizens. The lands ceded to the United States by that treaty are immense, and of unknown value. The mere territorial jurisdiction, acquired by that cession on the east side of the Mississippi, would have been a cheap purchase for the United States, at five millions of dollars. Would you sell it, sir, for twice that sum?

The United States, by that treaty, sold and relinquished to Spain all the claims of American citizens for all depredations committed by Spanish subjects on their property. Had our country covenanted, in the same instrument, to remunerate those citizens for such depredations, justice might have been done. This was the intention of Spain, and this must have been the intention of the United States. The supposition that those depredations could not exceed five millions, and the limiting remuneration to that amount, and the time of seeking it to so short a period, have brought on those citizens extensive and flagrant injustice. Permit me, sir, to demonstrate this assertion. Nearly all these depredations had been done before 1807. In June, 1824, when the time of receiving claims had expired, and the five millions were distributed, the interest, on that amount of claims allowed, exceeded the principal. It is evident, therefore, that, though five millions were paid, much more than five millions were left unpaid. I pass over all those claims, excluded for want of time, within the limits of the treaty. Their amount is several millions. Not less than two hundred thousand dollars were by this lost to me and those with whom I was concerned. One claim, half a million, eminently just, and distressing in its circumstances, has been before this House. It was the fruit and the reward of a life of toil, peril, and disaster in Spain; but by these limitations, and by the manner prescribed for conducting such claims, it was lost, and a very meritorious family are left dependant and destitute.

It is therefore seen that the common funds of the nation did not purchase one-half of Florida, and the other extensive regions obtained by this treaty from Spain. If justice be denied to the merchants of the Atlantic cities, from Maine to Georgia, whose funds purchased two-thirds of these territories, I pray you, sir, do not refuse to their States which have lost, with them, the benefit of this large capital; do not, I say, refuse to them a just and reasonable share in the common benefits resulting to the United States from this purchase.

The other division of the public lands was acquired by negotiations with France. They comprehend the whole region conveyed in the cession of Louisiana. In treaties connected with this cession, the United States contracted to pay to France, and for her use, eighty millions of francs; and virtually to relinquish all claims of American citizens on that Government for all demands prior to April 30th, 1800. One-fourth of this amount was agreed to be paid to such of those citizens as had claims of a certain description, and who should prove their right of recovery in one year from the date of the treaty. By this arrangement, the United States received from France an immense country, in jurisdiction and in fee simple, together with the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi, and all its western tributary streams. For this the United States paid fifteen millions of dollars in money, and relinquish to France, I will not say as much, but certainly one-half as much more, in claims due before April, 1801, from France to American citizens. Nor is this all. In the Louisiana treaty of cession, the United States contract to admit the vessels of France into the ports of that State, on the terms of the most favored nation. Under this stipulation, France claims to be admitted on the same terms as British vessels, but without paying for it the equivalent paid by the British Government, the admission of American vessels into French ports on the like conditions. Under this claim, and because the United States will not so admit French vessels, the French Government, by way of offset, have hitherto refused indemnity to American citizens for all the spoliation committed by their armed vessels on the property of our merchants since April, 1800. It has thus come to pass, that Louisiana, though on the face of the contract costing the nation but fifteen millions of dollars, has actually been purchased by a further sum of twenty millions, paid by American merchants. With what justice, then, can gentlemen contend that the Atlantic States are not entitled to call, and call loudly, for something like an equal apportionment of the benefits resulting from those lands, when the property of their merchants has been so largely sacrificed for the purchase of them?

The resolution of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Hunt] covers the public lands comprehended in these three great divisions, and proposes, without looking back to the cost of acquisition, or any expenditure for improving their value, to introduce and establish a system, which will give, to each State and territory a share of the proceeds of annual sales, in proportion to its congressional representation. It is intended, by the amendment, to inquire concerning, and to take account of all such dispositions of any of these lands, and all such expenditure of money, as may have been made to any of those several States and territories throughout the whole region.

The great argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, in support of his amendment, is drawn from principles of the English common law, regulating the settlement and distribution of intestate estates. These, it is contended by him, require that all such parts of the inheritance as may, at any time, have been bestowed upon any of the heirs at law, should first be brought into the account before any division of the whole can be made. I acknowledge the force of the principles, but cannot admit that any facts in question give warrant for their application. No part of the inheritance has ever been distributed to any of the heirs, otherwise than for the common benefit of the whole freehold; and our avuncular relative is now in the prime of his days; "a hale and prosperous gentleman," likely to live, and continue to use his own for the general welfare of the whole family. If, however, the gentlemen from South Carolina please, I am willing, for the purpose of the argument, to admit that the event supposed has already happened, or is very likely, in some short time, to take place. Let it then be granted that this Union, the work of patriotism, the theme of promise and hope to the wise and good of all nations, shall terminate—forgive, my country, forgive the supposition!—shall terminate to-morrow. In that event, would justice to the several States demand this inquiry and account?

For what purposes, and with what effects, has all been done, which has been done by the United States in the Western country, and in all other parts of our acquired territory? They were won or purchased from the European powers, or ceded by the several States, and the aboriginal titles to them have been extinguished, that they might be a common fund for the benefit of all. With the same object in view, they have been divided into States, and sold, so far as they have been sold, that this fund might become productive. To induce settlements in these States, and augment the price of lands, appropriations of money have been made to build roads from other States into these. Your national highway, the Cumberland road, has been constructed, and carried on, under this principle. The millions expended on that great work were expended to accommodate, and, by accommodating, to induce migration and settlement in the West. Lands reserved in all these States for schools, academies, and colleges, have been reserved, not only to form a better condition of society there, but to induce purchase, and augment price. Grants made for Government purposes, to locate houses of legislation, and tribunals of justice, were they gifts merely, and exclusively, for the accommodation of the people of those States? Were not the United States amply remunerated by the increased demand and value of all lands neighboring on these locations? Moneys, voted for clearing rivers, and donations of land, to aid in forming canals, will, when these great works shall be completed, expedite and cheapen travel and transportation, approximate the markets of the ocean to the lands and produce of the West, and thereby increase the value of both.

If these bestowments have been made in a spirit of magnificence, so have they produced magnificent effects. Education, laws, justice, and intercommunication among these States, and with the whole Union, have resulted from this great system of pre-emption and settlement. All these, carried out from the parent States by this system, and established in the West, comprehending and surrounding your residuary lands, have already replaced, and much more than replaced, the expenditure from the common fund. What would have been the condition of the West, had the United States, in the spirit of this amendment, either done nothing in that region for the benefit of the national domain, or wrought there with a niggardly hand; and, with a view to ultimate account, charged every thing, and annually placed a transcript of their ledger along the road of migration, that every man, moving thither, might read the terms and conditions of settlement? You would have turned back, or so obstructed, the current of population, that these extensive, cultivated, and prosperous communities would not now have been in existence. The United States might have been rich in her number of acres, but poor indeed in their value and current price. Allowing, then, the existence of the fact supposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, that the intestacy has happened, and the estate is to be divided, no account is to be taken for the great outlay by the common ancestor on the freehold, for clearing, improving, enclosing, and for other suitable fixtures; because all this expenditure was made by him for the common benefit of all the inheritance, and has thereby mightily increased in value the residuary undivided part of it.

It is, therefore, most clearly evident, that, if the Union were dissolved, and the whole concern must be settled next summer, no inquiry concerning western disbursements could be requisite for this purpose, because no account of them could, with any justice, be brought into the settlement. Would you, sir, in that event, push inquiry into the cost, and call for any account of the great national disbursements in "the old thirteen?" Will you call on those States to place before your committee for examination, and for report to this House, a list of light-houses, established to conduct commerce along your coasts; of custom-houses in all their districts, located for the collection of your revenue; of labors performed in removing obstructions to river or harbor navigation; of works done and in progress to erect moles and breakwaters to shelter ships laboring and in peril on your coasts; of armories, arsenals, and fortifications, founded to prevent wars, or to repel invasion; of dock yards, naval depositories, materials, structures unfinished, and ships now successfully conducting your commerce over every sea, and exhibiting the untarnished symbol of our Union, and power, and prosperity, in the ports of every quarter of the earth? Must they add to this catalogue of great national works an account of all and singular the appropriations made in furtherance of them, and for annual expenditure in keeping on foot, and afloat, your whole land and maritime establishment for national defence and security? No, sir, we shall in no event ever demand or render any such an account. Are we curious on these questions? Let the Land Office and the Treasury Department furnish all the facts and details for our gratification. If the copartnership be indeed terminated, then let us, in modern style, bring every thing to the hammer, "to close a concern." Our great arbitrator of the Netherlands might act as our auctioneer. Russia, fond of territory, would buy your "new lands." France and England, doubtless, might bid on your fortifications. The navy? No, not at auction. England well knows the weight and value of our ships. Let her take them at private sale. Who that remembers how gloriously their decks have been defended by American seamen, would ever suffer them to be trodden by men who do not fight their battles, and send up orisons and thanksgivings in the English tongue? The public buildings? You cannot expect this city would purchase these. Reserve them as monuments that you once were a nation. Let your Presidential mansion be made a monastery—a shrine, where the pilgrims of patriotism and piety may meet, and mingle their tears over the evanescent hopes of the world. Make this edifice, the ornament of our Union, its mausoleum. Call together the reverend and the holy of the land, and solemnize the funeral of our nation. Bring to this place the mouldering bones of Washington; bury them under the central dome; and then inscribe on these walls, "this was once the legislative hall of a nation having too much knowledge to be wise, and enjoying too much liberty to be free."

If, at the close of the Union, and on a final settlement of all national concerns, no such inquiry and account could be required, shall it be ordered now for any anterior purpose, and when no such event can be found within the range of human probability? What then is the object of the amendment? I cannot believe it was intended, though it seems most aptly contrived, to destroy the whole purpose and effect of the resolution. If, other than this, it have any purpose, it must be to inquire into these expenditures, that the several States, where they have been made, may be called upon to reimburse them. Can it then be the intention of gentlemen to demand from the West an equivalent for lands bestowed by this nation for education, government, justice, or improvements on highways by land or water? Has not the progress of population and settlements, induced by this system, amply repaid you in the augmented price of lands already sold, and in the increased value of those still remaining? Before this region was peopled, these lands were not worth five cents an acre. Your system, and its concomitants, have raised them to one hundred and twenty-five cents. The money account against all our lands, if we exclude the claims of citizens relinquished, amounts to about thirty-two millions of dollars. Already more than forty millions have been received from sales; and more than two hundred and ten millions of acres are surveyed and ready for market. This having been acquired, ceded, purchased, and improved, by common labor and treasure, is a common fund for the whole Union. Will it not, thus increased in value, amply remunerate you for any reservations, grants, or donations, made in the progress of settlement, for any peculiar benefit of the Western States?

Will you call for any account or compensation for these, merely because they were made for national purposes within their limits? You may, be assured of it, call with equal justice on the other States to repay you for expenditures made for commercial or defensive purposes, whether maritime or on land, within their limits. Who but the nation, shall pay the nation for her navy, her fortresses, and her marine establishments? Shall Rhode Island repay you the sums expended so needfully and skilfully at Brenton's Point? Will Virginia, sir, refund to you the disbursements on her own Potomac? Is it intended to look to that State, and to Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, for the national cost on the Cumberland road? If you can do all or any of these, you can, with equal claims of justice, charge to Delaware and Jersey, and exact from them repayment of the immense amount already, or in future, to be expended for erecting, in the waters of their bay, that mighty mole, behind which not only the legitimate navigation of all nations may take shelter, and be in safety, but where, too, the very corsairs of the ocean shall be permitted to escape the perils of the seas, and be reserved for that justice awaiting them on land. There is but one great rule in all such cases. Whatever may have been expended for national purposes, cannot, by any principle of justice, be ever made an item in the account, charged against any individual State. Under this rule, every grant of land in the new, and every expenditure of money in the old States, is excluded from inquiry under this amendment, unless we make the inquiry with no view to ulterior legislation, but solely to gratify a very laudable but very useless historic curiosity.

Neither let it be said that proximity to the place where such grants or expenditures are made, enhances the value of all neighboring lands, and, therefore, such States ought to make some remuneration to the United States in consideration of them. National prosperity requires these grants and expenditures to be made; and necessity compels the United States to make them in some specific place. By unalterable laws in the production of value, wherever you locate the employment of capital, you increase the value of lands immediately surrounding that location. A city, a village, or even a single establishment, collecting and employing capital, invariably enhances the value of adjoining lands. Was it ever heard that the owners of such capital ever called on the owners of such lands for compensation, because they chose to make these locations in their neighborhood?

Many men are desirous that all public expenditures should be made in their State and vicinity. This cannot be done; and, because it cannot, we are perpetually, like children about their toys, inquiring and contending concerning who has received the most. Bring such inquiry into this House, sir, and we shall inquire into nothing else, until men give up their avidity, or the nation can spread public expenditure, like the dew of Heaven, over every square inch of your territory.

Since these things are so, no inquiry should be made, no account be taken; because no account can, if taken, ever be adjusted, settled, and paid. No account can be adjusted, settled, and paid, because but one party has ever been concerned in these transactions. The United States having made all grants of land and expenditures of money to their own use, and for their own benefit, no principle of law, equity, or justice, will now permit them to take the items of their own account, and transfer them to the debt of any one of the several States.

The whole argument against the amendment has hitherto been governed by the supposition that this amendment admits the title to the public lands to be in the United States. The amendment, however, does not make this admission. By the principle of the resolution, the nation owns these lands; but by the principle of the amendment they are owned by the several States where they are located. For, if we are to make this inquiry, we are to make it because those States are to be charged with the expenditure made upon the lands; but they cannot be so charged if these lands are not the lands of those States. The amendment, therefore, ought not to prevail, unless their ownership appear conclusively.

I beg the indulgence of the House while I examine this amendment from this point of view. This certainly is a new claim. It is but a very short time since it was made. New and most remarkable, however, as it is, this claim has been publicly made by men in those States, high in responsible station; and that, too, in their official character. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PERRIS] has told us that this resolution involves delicate questions. This question of State ownership must be one of them. On what ground is it raised?

When opinions cannot be sustained by facts, men resort to metaphysics, and draw from that exhaustless store some dogma by which facts may be removed out of their way. State ownership of these lands is established by this process. It is made a necessary attribute of State sovereignty. The proselytes of this creed tell us that these States were, by the deeds of cession, to have, hold, and exercise all the rights and powers of free, independent, and sovereign States. Sovereignty, when located, is, they say, exclusive, within its territorial jurisdiction; because the very idea of one sovereignty in one place must exclude the idea of all other sovereignty in the same place. The United States, being a sovereignty, therefore, cannot hold lands within the limits of these new States, because they are exclusively the sovereigns within those limits. I will not answer this by any history of sovereignties, in either ancient or modern times; or, drawing from the same magazine of argument, reply that all human institutions of power are, in their very nature, limited; and that, therefore, where the power of one ends, that of another may well begin; but I will solicit the attention of the House to things as they are, to simple matters of fact.

It will not be pretended that the new are vested with more of the attributes of sovereignty than the old States; for the same deeds of cession provide that they shall, in sovereignty and in freedom and independence, be equal with them. The constitution, made not by the States, but by a power more sovereign than the States, by the people themselves, has provided that the United States may purchase and hold lands within the territorial limits of the several States. It is true this was made, at first, for the "old thirteen;" but the "new eleven," if they have received its privileges, cannot now disengage themselves from its obligations. Under this constitution, the United States have purchased and do hold lands to their own use; and for purposes of national commerce, revenue, and defence. They hold these lands not only in property, but also in sovereignty, and to the exclusion of all State power within their limits. Here is empire within empire established, to the utter discomfiture of all the disciples of mere abstraction. If, therefore, the United States can purchase and hold lands within the several States, it cannot be incompatible with the constitutional sovereignty of such States. How, then, can it conflict with that attribute, so to hold lands already purchased?

The right of taxation, co-extensive with their territorial limits, is claimed as another attribute of sovereignty in the new States. The lands of the United States within those limits are not taxable by these States; and, therefore, this ownership of those lands is in conflict with State sovereignty in this respect, and deprives them of the legal exercise of it. Here, again, all the States are alike limited. The lands of the United States cannot, in any of the old States, be taxed; and why, then, I pray, sir, should the new States have the right of taxing them? Not only the freehold, but the goods and chattels, rights and credits, of the United States, are covered by this principle of exemption. It extends to all your establishments for commerce or revenue; all your provisions for defence, whether fixed or floating; and also to all munitions of war, both military and naval. Would you tax the millions of your revenue deposited in the United States' banks, when it has been solemnly decided by your Supreme Court that you cannot tax the rights granted by you, and exercised in their daily operations by those banks?

This exemption from taxation claimed for the public lands, is, therefore, not incompatible with the rights of sovereignty in the States where they are located.

It would, moreover, be unjust in those States to tax these lands, even if they now had the legal power to do it. It is agreed that the reservations, grants, donations, and expenditures made in those States, have been remunerated to the United States, by inviting settlement, increasing population, and thereby augmenting the price of lands sold, and increasing the value of each particular acre still remaining on hand. How has this effect been produced, and by what principle? It was because all those bestowments were privileges, anxiously desired and highly valued; and the people were willing to pay, and have paid, a fair equivalent for them. What was this exemption from taxation? Was that a privilege anxiously desired, and highly valued, by all who purchased lands and settled in those States? No, sir; it was an incumbrance, and has diminished the price of all the lands sold, in exact proportion to its weight and extent. The purchasers have received, in this diminished cost of their lands, a full compensation for this privilege of the United States to hold the residue, exempted from taxes. The exemption has, therefore, been purchased; the consideration paid; and not only law, but justice itself, forbids it again to be exacted.

If, however, the new States persist in their claim, let it be allowed; but so allowed, that no injustice shall be done to the United States. Let it be settled as all such cases are settled in new countries. When one man sits down upon the lands of another, with the knowledge of the owner, and having purchased, supposes it to be his own; when, after years of labor, he has converted a forest into orchards, cornfields, grazing grounds, and meadows; and when the owner, after looking on during all this process of labor and improvement, comes to call for his land, with all these improvements, what shall be the measure of your justice between him and the occupant? Such cases are so frequent in our country, that a word, homely but very significant, has been coined, and made current in our language, for adjustment of them. The word is "betterments;" and, in the case supposed, if the land be adjudged to the claimant, a full compensation for the betterments would be awarded to the occupant. No matter what these betterments may have cost, they would be appraised at their then present value. Had they cost twice that amount, the claimant must not suffer by it; and, were they worth twice their cost, the occupant shall not suffer by his enterprise, skill, and economy.

This scale of decision is quite large enough, and sufficiently accurate to decide the question before us. If it were needful, we could not estimate the value of what these lands have cost this nation. The toil, valor, and blood of the colonies and the United States are not items to be set down in the every day books of ordinary labor and occupation. The jurisdiction has already been conveyed to the new States. That is worth more than the French right of discovery; but all which has since been added to that right, has been added by the United States, at the common cost of the whole. What, then, have the United States done to these lands? How have they bettered them? They have, by a great system of improvement, changed the French right of discovery, and the English right of pre-emption, into an estate better than European fee simple; into allodial right; estate of inheritance, indefeasible under our constitution, by bill of attainder, or judicial corruption of blood. This improved title, and the incidents connected with it, are the betterments made upon these lands by the United States. The question is not, what have they cost? for that, if it could be counted, cannot be exacted in payment. What, then, are these betterments worth? What will each acre of this clear and indefeasible estate of inheritance bring in the market? The answer to this question will settle the amount payable by the several States claiming these lands, and payable for the betterments done on them by the United States, whilst they have been the occupants; and, as every body believed till quite within a short time, with a very fair and legal title to them.

Perhaps, so far as surveys and returns have been made, the United States would now, on this principle, if agreed not to be drawn into precedent, settle with the new States. About two hundred and ten millions of acres are in that condition. Let these States take that quantity; and, since it would be something like a wholesale transaction, let them take it at the minimum price, one hundred and twenty-five cents the acre. The whole amount for this two hundred and ten millions of acres will, at that rate, amount to but two hundred and sixty-two million five hundred thousand dollars. Cash in hand will not, I presume, be exacted. If payment be well secured "by bond and mortgage," with stipulation for interest, to be paid, not so often neither as the United States pay, quarterly, but as all banks make their dividends, semi-annually, the arrangement will, it may be fairly supposed, satisfy all concerned. Nor will the elder States exact hard conditions from their youthful companions in this sisterhood of States; but to convince them that "the whole land is not filled with covetousness," not the highest, but the lowest legal rate of interest would doubtless be satisfactory. At six per centum, and no law in any of the several States gives less, the annual amount is fifteen million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. In the distribution of this sum, the new and the old States will alike, by the system proposed in the resolution, receive their yearly dividends, and according to the ratio, and for the purposes therein proposed.

Another "delicate question" concerning these lands doubtless refers to the famous graduation laws, which have heretofore produced such singular effects in the West. These laws propose to sell, at a fixed price, the whole, and thereby quiet conflicting claims.

This project to dispose of these lands, at a fixed and certain price, will, it is believed, settle the question of ownership. The two hundred and ten millions of acres, now surveyed and ready for market, are to be disposed of under this project. For this purpose, the whole is distributed into five allotments. These are to be graduated by a scale of prices, comprehending five grades, and extending to five years. The first year, lands are not to be sold for less than one hundred and twenty-five cents per acre; the second, for not less than one hundred; the third, not less than seventy-five; the fourth, not less than fifty; and the fifth, at not less than twenty-five cents. In the course of these five years, it is intended to dispose of the whole quantity. This is, neither more nor less, than a project to divest the United States of their title to the whole of these lands; and, for twenty-five cents an acre, to transfer them, to whom? To the new States? No, not so; but to place them in the hands of speculators. The movers of this project intend it shall be believed, by the people of those States, that it is moved exclusively for their benefit. This consideration alone has concealed from them the true motives of the scheme. They have imagined that this graduation of price will be made with a just reference to the different qualities and locations of these lands. In this they are deceived. Those who purchase will purchase to sell again; for it is not pretended that the whole nation can furnish men enough to purchase the whole for immediate settlement. Who will purchase lands for sale at one dollar twenty-five cents the first year, when he knows the same kind of lands, if unsold till the fifth, must then be sold at twenty-five? The whole lands, therefore, will remain till the last sale; and then be struck down at the lowest graduation price. This is a scheme for speculation, and not for settlement; and if it divest the United States of the lands, at a fifth part of their minimum value, it will not invest the New States with any title to them. The principle of this amendment is, therefore, not sustained by any ownership of the new States in the public lands, either present or in expectancy.

Some objections have been made to the resolution; because, as is alleged, the time for moving it has not now arrived. It is premature. These were made in aid of the amendment; and I beg to detain the House by a very short answer to some of them. We are told that public excitement is too great for cool and deliberate, and successful discussion. The nation has been under much excitement. The Presidential election did, indeed, in all parts of the country, put into motion every element of political party. The great question, however, has been determined; and these elements have again subsided, and are now at rest. The conflict and the claim might, not unaptly, be compared to two conditions of the ocean. Look out upon it from some promontory, then the sun goes down behind a night of clouds and storm. The tempest, in his most terrible strength and rapidity, rushes over the boiling and foaming deep. Every billow is contending which shall lift his head highest, or give the loudest roar. A single ship, the last of a mighty fleet, shows, by a glimpse of daylight, now her trembling side on the ridge of the surge, and now but the shivering top of her only mast. Look again from the same point the next morning, when the young sun-beams are careering athwart the level surface of the wide and undisturbed waters. The whole bosom of the ocean is still, and in repose. The morning slumbers of infancy could not be more quiet. The political storm has left our country, it is devoutly to be hoped, in something like this condition. Higher claims of our nature are calling us to better, more profitable, and congenial pursuits. The every day relations of life will have fair play; and already have they brought us back to the feelings of citizenship, neighborhood, friendship, and brotherly kindness.

A great battle has, indeed, swept through the land; but it is over and gone. The fragments of this feast of war are nearly consumed by "the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the air." The tatters and the putrescent offal of battle alone remain on the ground of conflict. The meretricious and odious followers of the camp, who have lured the living to profligacy, are now in shoals, following the footsteps of slaughter, to strip and plunder the dead. Flights of foul vultures, at times, sail and scream over the field. Flocks of filthy, carrion crows creak in the air, and now and then alight on some yet unconsumed carcass. In one quarter, troops of gaunt and famished wolves howl at each other's eyes; in another, packs of lean and hungry dogs bark and growl over bones already stripped to the very last fibre. All these, unless whipt and shouted away from their foul controversy, will remain and linger about the battle ground, so long as there is one rag to pillage, or one bone to gnaw. These, what are they? Who, sir, who can call this refuse of the earth the American people? Thank God it is not so. Like the sea weed on your shores, this mass is but manure. It is no more the people, or like the people, than the sweepings of the stable are the high mettled and generous war horse.

The two great parties have retired. The triumphant, satisfied, and warmed, I trust, with magnanimity. The defeated, as I know, patriotic and patient, and deeply imbued with the fortitude peculiar to their condition. What then, at this time, hinders one united effort to carry forward a great scheme for national good? Tell us not that a Presidential election has just past. We shall shortly be told, a Presidential election will soon arrive. Devote, I pray of you, sir, devote the narrow interval, the auspicious now, to the service of the people. Put in practice the sound maxim, the vigilant diligence of the husbandman; and, like him, remember that those are

"Brightest of all the sun's bright beams,
When betwixt storm, and storm, he gleams."

It is further said by some gentlemen that this measure is premature; because these lands are pledged for payment of the national debt, and this remains still undischarged. What are we to understand by this assertion? In England, whenever any new assessment is made, either by imposts, excise, or direct taxation, a grant is made of it to the King, as a part of the royal revenue for national purposes. The King, by his ministers of finance, disposes of this assessment for so much money as will be realized from it, or for a loan, the annual interest of which will be covered by this new grant of revenue. By the contract, the grant is pledged for the reimbursement of the loan, both interest and principal. In this manner nearly all the English sources of annual revenue are pledged for the payment of their immense loans, amounting to about nine hundred millions of pounds sterling. Do gentlemen mean that the public lands are thus pledged for the payment of the public? No such pledge has ever been made.

The financial system of this country is altogether different. Congress have, at some times, in their revenue laws, assigned certain specific parts of the revenue to the payment of the public debt; but this has never been by way of contract with their creditors; nor in but few instances, until after the debt was contracted. At any time, Congress might, with perfect good faith, appropriate any part of the revenue to any purpose, other than the sinking fund, provided the amount of that fund were, at all times, equal to the annual amount of the interest on the public debt. Large appropriations have been made to that fund, for sinking that debt; not because our creditors demanded, or good faith required it, but because the nation was anxious to discharge all its responsibilities. Accordingly, Congress have, notwithstanding these laws, appropriated at different times, out of the annual revenue, for redeeming Mississippi, Florida, and Louisiana stocks, more than thirty millions, interest and principal. The whole excise, and the direct tax, in all its branches, were pledged, if any revenue was pledged, for payment of the public debt. These have been repealed. Was the national good faith violated?

The lands in Florida, and on the west of the Mississippi, have never, even by implication, been pledged. How stands the fact with regard to lands in the "Western country?" These are the words used in the cession of Georgia: "All the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." In a law, made by Congress after this cession, it is enacted that the proceeds of the lands so ceded shall be appropriated to the payment of the public debt in the same manner as the proceeds of all the lands north of the Ohio are appropriated. This enactment is no part of the cession, or of the consideration moving it. Neither is there any law appropriating the proceeds of those lands to that purpose. For all the other cessions, including that of Virginia, are, in this respect, almost in the same words used in that of Georgia. There is no clause in one of them, restricting the use of those lands to any particular purpose. They are all made for the common benefit of all the States. An erroneous construction of a clause in the Virginia cession has induced the opinion that all the lands are pledged for the payment of the public debt. This clause relates to the ratio of distributing to the several States the benefits resulting to the United States from these lands. These are the words of it, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure." The ratio of contribution to the expenditure for the war being made the ratio of distribution for the benefits resulting of these lands, the opinion has obtained, that this distribution was, first of all, to be made to reimburse those expenditures; or, in other words, for the payment of the public debt.

Although this opinion is altogether groundless, yet let it be allowed to be sound, and well supported. If these lands were pledged for payment of that public debt which resulted from the revolutionary war, then it is pledged for no more of the whole than such portion of that part of it as now remains unpaid. This comprehends the three per cent. stocks. The whole amount is about thirteen millions of dollars. It is not probable that the creditors, or the nation, will soon be anxious for the payment of those stocks. The money, in the people's pockets, is worth at least six per cent. to them; but if they are taxed to pay these stocks, their money must be paid to sink a debt which annually costs them but three per cent. As these stocks are payable at the pleasure of Government, and the creditors are satisfied with quarterly payments of the interest, rather than receive the principal, no more than the interest will ever be required by them. This amounts annually to about three hundred and ninety thousand dollars. The dividends on the United States' shares in the national bank are yearly about four hundred and twenty thousand dollars; and if, by a standing law, these are appropriated to the payment of that interest, the public lands would for ever be redeemed from this supposed pledge, and that, too, without any forfeiture of the national good faith.

Another objection has, by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Lewis] been made to the proposed system. He questions the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands to purposes of education and internal improvement. From what State, at what period of the history, of what nation, and in what public assembly, is this objection, for the first time, made? Why, truly, from a State which has received, and justly, too, reservations in every township, for primary schools, other lands for academies, and more than twenty-five thousand acres for a State university. A State which, two years ago, received a donation of four hundred thousand acres of rich lands on the banks of the Tennessee, for canalising that river round the Muscle shoal, and to unite the waters of this rich stream with those of Mobile bay. Has it not been the settled policy of the United States, ever since these lands came into their possession, to make in all the new States liberal bestowments of these lands, or the money arising from the sales of them, for the very purposes moved in this resolution? Nay, more, when that almost the greatest of all discoveries of this age, the art to teach, though not literally, the deaf to hear and the dumb to speak, was brought from France into this country, what did the United States do? They bestowed on Connecticut, one of the old thirteen, a leading State in all human improvements, a township of land for aid in establishing a seminary, for carrying into practice, in our nation, this interesting discovery. Shall it then be said, that, when appropriations from this fund have been made, whereby the light of science may be seen, and the voice of eternal truth be heard in the regions of darkness and silence, you will deny us the power to make them for purposes the most ordinary and common to all the people? After this objection, no new constitutional scruple can ever be astonishing. When States rise up, and deny to the mother which brought them into existence the natural right to cherish in her arms, and nurse from her own bosom, the children of her labor, what further discovery can confound the universal properties of things, and minister to our astonishment? Gentlemen do not seem to remember that the public lands belonged to the United States before the constitution was adopted; and that, therefore, their power to appropriate them is not derived from that instrument. For lands, those purchased since, they have, so far as obtained at the common cost, been reimbursed from sales of land, and for that reason the whole land system stands on one foundation, and is the result of ownership, and not of powers bestowed by the constitution.

Distribution of Public Lands.

The gentleman who made the last objection, has told us that all men friendly to the tariff will support this resolution. This may be true in fact, and still furnish no argument against it. Two facts may exist together, without the relation of cause and effect. This resolution proposes to appropriate a certain yearly amount of our revenue to education and internal improvement. Less revenue will, therefore, remain for all other purposes. The direct effect of the tariff is the same thing. It proposes to supply the country with the great staple necessities of life from domestic, not from foreign production. When this shall be fully effected, therefore, foreign importation of such products will cease. One great part of the revenue has been produced by impost duties on this importation. The perfect effect of the tariff will cut off this part of the revenue, by taking away such importation. The direct effect of the tariff, and of this resolution, are then the same, the reduction of the amount of revenue, disposable, for present expenditure, by the Government. How then is the allegation of the gentleman sustained? Will men who have voted to take away one part of the revenue, vote to take away another, and that, too, merely because they have voted to take away that other part? It might, with equal justice, be contended, that a man would lay aside and cease to wear his coat, because he had no occasion for his cloak. The tariff may, by its effects on domestic production and wealth, induce greater importation of the luxuries, when it has terminated the importation of the necessities of the country, and thereby sustain the revenue at its former amount. This, however, is but an accidental, not a necessary effect of the tariff system; and men might and would support that system, if its accidents ceased to follow it. The tariff is, therefore, placed on the back of this resolution, not like the hunch on the camel, because it belongs there; but like surplus weight adroitly thrown on the back of a race horse to impede him in the course, and disappoint the hope of his success.

Another objection against this measure is sustained by associating its provisions with names, rendered odious by allusions to other nations and other times. It is said, any attempt to establish this system in the new States will fill them with "taskmasters and tax-gatherers." The success of this class of arguments should not be allowed to go one step beyond their justice. I shall not, probably, disagree with the gentleman's opinion, whatever it may be, concerning those characters of antiquity. The cry of distress, raised by those under the exactions of "taskmasters," early reached the ear of Heaven; and the signal display of Divine vengeance visited upon a community of those miscreants, is found in the eldest record of God's wrath against a guilty nation. Tax-gatherers, the publicans of the Roman nation, were odious in all the provinces of that empire, because they "exacted more than was appointed to them." Hateful they doubtless were, when we are told, on the highest authority, that the whole learning and wordly wisdom of a nation rejected the greatest of blessings, and denounced, as a demon, the messenger of Heaven, because, when he came to call sinners to repentance and redemption, he did not place this description of them without the pale of penitence, and beyond the reach of Divine mercy.

Sir, can these classic allusions be applied, with justice, to our country? Shall men in this nation, because they employ labor, whether due by the appointments of law, or exacted by virtue of contract, or because they collect public revenue, derived either from legal assessment, or due and owing for valuable consideration, fairly conveyed, shall such men, for no other cause but their employment, and when they "exact no more than is appointed to them," shall they, by any license of sound argument, or ardent imagination, be branded, like the detested oppressors of antiquity, with the odious titles of taskmasters and tax-gatherers? In what other country, I pray, is freehold and inheritance so acquired as it is in the United States? Young men in the old States, who "work out" from sixteen to twenty-one, and whose fathers receive one-half their wages for their clothing, their home, and subsistence while not employed, can then go to the West, purchase a farm, and, with labor and economy, they are, in a few years, independent and prosperous. Many, many have followed that course—they now find themselves well off in the world and members in the first rank of flourishing and highly cultivated communities. What would fathers, in any part of Europe, not willingly lay down in exchange, could they purchase such establishments for their sons?

Our country, sir, is bountiful to all her children. She takes from the common inheritance a portion, and as much, too, as he may desire, for each. In return, she requires of him but to place a fair equivalent, as all have done, in the common treasury, for the benefit of himself and all others of the great national household. Nay, she does more. She gives day of repayment; and permits such children to occupy, each his new heritage, until he can draw from it the required equivalent. Shall these indulged sons, when, at length, our country, the common mother of us all, comes to request this equivalent; shall these sons, thus cherished and fed with us all in her uberous bosom, shall they, because of this just and righteous requirement, denounce their mother, call her a sorceress, a jezebel; and cry out to her servants to throw her down, "that her blood may be sprinkled on the wall," and she trodden by horse-hoofs into the mire?

Sir, I ask for the indulgence of the House for a few moments, while I offer two or three considerations as arguments against this amendment, because they are in favor of this resolution. If we adopt this resolution, and establish the system proposed by it, the great scheme of speculation, projected by the graduation laws, will be forever destroyed. Let the proceeds of annual sales of the public lands be distributed among the States for education and internal improvement, and those States will look to this as a regular undeviating supply for these purposes; and such system will soon be established for both, as may regularly be kept in motion by that supply. The supply will be governed by the sales of land, and those by the demand for settlement. This demand, governed by increase of population, will be even, uniform, and continuous. One part of the system will be adjusted to another, and to the whole; and no part can be taken away, or varied in its movements, without destroying or deranging the entire system. As the nation advances in growth, sales for settlements will increase with the increased demand made by increased population; and this increased population and settlement will call for, and consume, in education and internal improvement, the augmented proceeds of annual sales. Population, settlement, education, and improvement, will hold their united march, until your whole territory, cultivated and improved, is filled with a well educated, great, and prosperous people. At what point in this progress, when once established, can speculation find a place, and patronage to enter, derange, and overthrow this great system?

On the other hand, let this graduation scheme be established, and such a speculation will follow as the world never witnessed. Put but a part of this land, the two hundred and ten millions of acres surveyed, under this project, and at the lowest price, twenty-five cents, it will call for fifty-two million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to purchase it. It will promise a profit of at least five hundred per cent. Men of small and large capital—the speculation of Europe and America, will be excited and roused in this career of riches. The stock speculations of former times were to this but the amusements of boys blowing up bubbles with rye straws in tumblers of water. It will expand over men's heads, like another firmament, with all its rainbows of promise, and each the pledge of a new world of wealth. Capital, labor, adventure, every thing will be left for this. Ordinary enterprise, and employments exhausted, must linger and give place to visions, each "richer than a South Sea dream." Warrants, patents, conveyances, will cover the land, and scrip, in volumes, like clouds of locusts, will devour every other species of contract.

Nor is this the whole mischief. Eagerness to acquire will induce men to purchase beyond their means. Sales, and failures of little capitalists and little companies must follow, until one great English and American land company will swallow up and engross the whole. Monopoly thus secured, will secure monopoly price. Sales will stop; settlement in the new States become difficult; but migration from the old States, though discouraged, will continue. Unlocated population, accumulated in the West, must increase demand; and this increased demand as certainly raise the price of land. The concerns of this Leviathan land company, managed by men skilful in managing all these elements of speculation, will keep every acre of land out of the market until demand has become so importunate, that what has been engrossed by them at twenty-five cents, will readily sell at twenty times that amount. Let not the new States console themselves with the assurance that they could tax those lands so high as to compel sales at reasonable prices. Such a company would always have the means of preventing this, by securing a sufficient number of demagogues, if such instruments might be found in the "Western country;" and, if not, they could manufacture them on this side the mountains, and transport them over, to be set up and worked whenever they might be wanted. This machinery, put in operation, kept in gear, and skilfully managed, would soon satisfy the people of those States, that every tax assessed on these lands would be added to the price of them, and finally be a tax on settlers. Let us pause, then, before we reject this resolution, and diligently and impartially inquire whether the interests of the new and the old States do not demand the adoption of some such system as that proposed by it, to the intent that this scheme of speculation, and all its mischiefs, may be prevented, by putting down, at once, and for ever, this wild project of graduation and sale of the public lands.

Permit me to offer one other reason for rejecting the amendment, and adopting the resolution. The system proposed, if carried into operation, will settle and quiet the question of ownership between the States and the Union. It is now but incipient, not quite formed, and grown into existence. No great party has yet taken it into patronage. At this time, all, who have in any way looked at this question with an eye of cupidity or ambition, might be brought to a satisfied condition, by the awards of sound policy and equal justice. The provisions of this resolution do certainly propose something like such awards. When the system shall be arranged, modified, completed, and carried into operation, in every State, so manifest will be its justice and utility, that the people of the new, alike with those of the old States, satisfied with its common benefits, will also be satisfied that this always was, and for ever ought to be, a common fund, for the benefit of all the States. The question of ownership will be laid to rest; and never be again raised to distract our councils or disturb our Union.

Sir, is not this "a consummation devoutly to be wished?" Who that has regarded the course and ardor of this debate, can, with this question unsettled, look forward without anxious forebodings of the possible future condition of our country? Men submit to the privation of money and movables; and, sometimes, take joyfully the spoiling of their goods. Our relations to the soil are more endeared, of higher value in estimation, and defended with a perseverance more unyielding and obstinate. We cling to our allotment of the earth with a grasp which nothing in life or death can unclench. Every man is a hero on the frontiers of his own field. We die on the ground, and are buried in its bosom.

The people of the United States have, sir, from the close of the Revolutionary war till this hour, looked on the public lands as their own, and equally the soil and freehold and inheritance of each and every one of them. This claim has been kept alive and invigorated by reminiscence of its common origin, and endeared by the various and multiplied appropriations from year to year by us made, as well for them, to their use, as for the universal benefit of this great national inheritance. When, therefore, their title is disturbed, their ownership questioned, and that, too, by brothers of the same family, how will you quiet the controversy? Will the people of the old States quit claim to the people of the new; and that in sight of the graves of their fathers, who won this region as a heritage for all their descendants? Why should they, recreant to their illustrious ancestry, disinherit themselves and their children? Be assured, sir, they will not, while man is man, and earth is his abiding place. Let, then, every effort be made to put this question at rest, in peace and by fair and honest legislation. It may otherwise remain for adjustment, by a process, and in a tribunal over whose record the historian shall shudder as he looks at the legend.

Should it come, and without something like the proposed measure, it may come to the "trial by battle;" should it come to that trial, who will live to say the world ever witnessed such a strife of arms? The visions of fiction have sometimes arrayed against each other the most endeared relations. Here those visions shall be embodied and embattled. Not only these long United States shall sunder, and State against State fly to arms, but brother and brother, father and son, meet in exterminating hostility. Eye to eye, or hand to hand, with no exchange of greeting but the rifle—no salutation but the sword. In such a war, shall not the last red man, who fell by bullet or bayonet, lift his head from the gory sod, and gaze and die with grim delight, while looking on those whom he regards as the spoilers of his race, mingling their blood in impious butchery, on the very grounds of his fathers, and in a most unholy struggle for his and their plunder? In the noise of war and slaughter, imagination shall hear the long buried warriors, the Metacams, the Miantinomos of other fields again mingling their war whoop with the cry of the white man's battle. Men shall see, or seem to see, grim spirits, the chiefs and warriors of other days, approaching from their blessed hunting grounds, in the far-off West, or, if driven thence, from "some happier island in the watery waste," horsed on their own clouds in red brigades, "visiting again the glimpses of our moon, and making the night of war and conflagration more horribly hideous."

Once more, sir, and I have done. If this amendment do not prevail, and this resolution is adopted, the provisions of it, when finally adjusted and carried into full operation, will mightily strengthen the Union. For this purpose the cessions of it were originally made. It has been said, a national debt, divided and distributed to all its owners over the country, does form a cord of Union not easily broken. It may be so; but what is that to the almost infinite number of cords, lines, and filaments, which will, by the provisions of this system, be wound around and unite us together? Distribute to the several States the annual proceeds of the public lands, and, on its way thither, it will make the straight way broad, the rough road smooth. Travel and transportation by our present vehicles will be cheap and expeditious. When we have introduced into our country the inventions already in operation in others, movement from place to place may be so rapid, and exchange of social and hospitable intercourse between different parts of the whole country will become so easy and frequent, that men will almost forget that their homes are in different States, and become really and in fact citizens of the United States of one great republic. By roads, by railways, or by canals, by land or by water, the produce of any part may, cheaply and with expedition, be placed in the market of any other.

Distribute to every State a fund for education, and it will be divided and subdivided into streams, until it shall reach every town, every village, every plantation, farm, and family, throughout the United States. Let the people once taste of these refreshing streams, and they will look up to the United States, their beneficent source, and regard them with delight and veneration. They would turn their thoughts to them, as the inhabitants of ancient Egypt did theirs towards the fountains of the Nile; and, though not with adoration, yet surely as to the dispensers of the blessings of Heaven.

When this system shall have gone into full operation over all the land, and but one generation has been cultivated and grown up under its fertilizing nature, no demagogue will ever rise up in our country hardy and desperate enough to divert or obstruct the current of its progress. Should a man, in aftertime, on this floor, move to appropriate a single dollar of this fund to any other purpose, he would be hissed through the country by one united cry of abhorrence from every man, woman, and child in the nation.

If, therefore, the United States would make the inhabitants of every distinct district of our territory one people, a nation, united, great, wealthy, and prosperous, let them provide, and put into successful operation in every State, appropriate funds for internal improvement. If our country would render her union and existence perpetual; if she would place deep and broad the foundations of her prosperity; if she would distinguish herself eminently above all other nations of this or any other time; then let her draw high example from Divine benignity, call little children around her, take them in her arms, and bless them with the lessons of pure, early, and efficient instruction.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th December ultimo, proposing a distribution of the net proceeds of sales of public lands among the several States.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN, on the same day, to amend the said resolution.

Mr. PETTIS, of Missouri, concluded his remarks on the subject, which he commenced yesterday.

They were to the following effect:

Mr. P. began by saying, that, were he to consult his own feelings, or his own individual interests on this floor, he should not trouble the House with one word more on this subject. But, [said Mr. P.] when I see a measure pressed with all the powers of argument and of eloquence, the consequences of which will, in my opinion, be highly injurious to the State which I have the honor to represent—a measure which addresses itself to the cupidity of the people of the old States—to the worst as well as the best passions of the human heart—a scheme, whose tendency is to mislead and corrupt the public mind, to cripple the West, and to fix a system of intolerable oppression upon the new States—I should be recreant to the interests of those whom I serve, faithless to the new States and to my own principles, if I did not raise my voice against it. These considerations constrain me to throw myself upon the indulgence of the House, and to solicit their patient attention to the views which I shall present in relation to this interesting subject. Sir, when this resolution was first offered, I was not disposed to engage in a discussion of its merits. Considering it as looking to an inquiry alone, I preferred to forbear making any opposition until something more specific and of a more serious character should be presented to the House. The friends of this scheme have, however, thought proper to enter into a general argument upon its merits, and have left us no alternative but that of abandoning the contest, or of at once meeting them in debate. They have done more, sir. With the intention, as it would seem, of forestalling public opinion, of gaining the “vantage ground,” and of inducing a belief that their arguments were unanswerable, they have intimated that those opposed to the resolution were directing their attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN] but decline arguing the main question involved. Sir, I meet that question: I cannot say I meet it boldly, for I know the argumentative powers and the eloquence of the various interests which this resolution draws to its support. But I meet it in the full confidence of the correctness of the principles upon which I rely; and indulging a hope that, if I fail to convince this House, an intelligent, just, and patriotic people, will render a proper decision of the question, I take leave, in the outset, to repel the imputation attempted to be cast upon those who oppose the resolution, that they are influenced by selfish considerations. The people whom I represent desire no unfair advantages. They ask for nothing but their just and equal rights, and these they are determined to maintain. I trust that my conduct on this floor will not only prove that I request no more, but that, in the discussion of every question here, I shall meet gentlemen in that spirit of candor and of fairness which should characterize the representation of an honest and patriotic people. Sir, I will most sincerely pray, with the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BRIGGS] that we may catch the spirit of magnanimity, of concession, of forbearance, and of disinterestedness, which animated and influenced the fathers of the Revolution. I will go with him to the altar of patriotism erected by them, and there freely sacrifice every feeling, either selfish or sectional—I will pray that the common interests of our common country, of our whole country, may alone influence us in all our deliberations. Sir, I had hoped that that gentleman had long since made this sacrifice—I had hoped to consider the gentleman as one of the connecting links in that bright chain which connected us with our liberal and patriotic ancestors.

Sir, from what has fallen from gentlemen in this debate, from what I have ascertained of the views of members on the subject under consideration, I have been astonished, and a little amused, too, to find gentlemen of all sorts of political opinions supporting this resolution. Yes, sir: I find those who maintain the power in the General Government of making roads and canals, and of providing for a general system of education, supporting it. I find some of those who deny this power supporting it; and I see that description of politicians who are in favor of a compound basis of construction. I mean those who are for splitting the difference between the demands for power on the one side, and the denials on the other, also rallying in its support. I find another description of politicians supporting it; those who express doubts as to the constitutional power of Congress to make donations of the public lands for any purpose, but who think it perfectly clear that we have the power to distribute the nett proceeds of the public lands among the several States for the purposes of internal improvement and of education. Not the least amusing of all are the opinions of those who think that we have no power to distribute the surplus revenue (if there should ever be any) among the several States, for the purposes mentioned, but who also think we have the power to distribute for the same purposes the proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] takes a distinction. He tells us there is a manifest distinction between the two cases; but he has not thought fit to point it out. Sir, what that distinction is, I cannot conjecture; but if there be a distinction at all, it is against the gentleman, as I shall presently show. When the money arising from the sales of the public lands is paid into the treasury, how will the gentleman distinguish it from the other funds of the Government? Has it ear-mark? Can he show that the constitution gives us greater power over one description of funds than it has over another? Sir, the framers of the constitution found it necessary not to restrict the power of Congress in getting money into the treasury, but they have limited the power as to their getting money out of the treasury. They granted the power of appropriating money for the purpose of carrying into effect the powers of the Government. And I think it fair to presume that this limitation was intended as a check upon Congress, to prevent them from oppressing the people by unnecessary taxation. It was doubtless considered, that, if the power of appropriating money should be limited, there was no necessity for restricting Congress as to the quantum of revenue to be raised. Sir, the doctrine is held, that Congress can appropriate money for any purpose, even for purposes over which it is acknowledged they have no control. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to apply this doctrine to the case under consideration, but denies its force in relation to the distribution of the surplus revenue. Now, admitting for the sake of argument, that Congress has the power to distribute the surplus revenue arising from imports or direct taxation if you please, among the several States for the purposes of internal improvement and education, it by no means follows that they have the power to distribute the proceeds of the public lands for these purposes. In the acts of cession made to the United States by Virginia and North Carolina, are the provisions expressed, "that all the lands so ceded to the United States shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederacy, Virginia and North Carolina inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other purpose whatever." The same is strongly implied in the cessions made by other States. At the time of making these cessions, each State had to contribute its share in the general charge and expenditure of the confederacy. These lands then were ceded for the common benefit, and for the purpose of raising funds for the support of the Government, so as to diminish the sum required by each to supply the common treasury. The proceeds of these lands are consequently directly pledged as a fund out of which to defray the expenses of the then existing government; and I ask, if, under the old confederation, it would have been competent for Congress to have distributed these funds for the purposes named in the resolution now under consideration? If not, can it be pretended that Congress under the present constitution has greater powers in relation to these lands than it had during the confederation? Can they change the objects of the grant? If they cannot, what becomes of the distinction spoken of by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

ers of this resolution, not with a view of pressing an argument on constitutional grounds, but with the intention of throwing gentlemen back on their original principles, with a view of showing a reasonable ground for my apprehensions that the friends of this measure are more influenced by feelings of interest than by their unbiassed judgment. Has the time come, sir, when we are to blot out and begin anew? Are the principles of all parties to be abandoned in this scramble for the public treasure? Are the honest opinions of the people to be brought up by the miserable pittance arising from the sales of the public lands? Sir, whenever this Government shall be destroyed—when ever this blessed Union shall be divided, (and the gentleman from Rhode Island says he expects it will be some time next summer,) whenever tyranny or anarchy shall be our portion, the faithful historian will trace the cause of such a calamity to schemes like this—to schemes which tend to corrupt the principles and feelings of the good people of this Union by the money of the General Government. I can conceive of no state of things more dangerous than that which will find the people of these States looking to the treasury of the General Government alone, expecting from that source to be fed, clothed, and educated; and ready to surrender all their principles, constitutional and moral, for the accomplishment of their objects. The time seems already come, when gentlemen, in the language of the member from North Carolina, [Mr. PORTER] are determined to get their share of every dollar in the public treasury.

The opponents of this resolution have asked why this measure is pressed upon us, while the whole subject of distributing the surplus revenue among the States has been submitted for inquiry to a standing committee of this House? We have received no answer. Sir, I rejoice, and I hope the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] will rejoice with me, that the President has directed our attention to the principles upon which this Government is founded. I am glad that he has reminded us that there were limitations on the Government—for I fear that some of us would otherwise have forgotten it. We hear urged that these lands were pledged for the payment of the national debt, and have asked why this subject is pressed before that debt shall have been paid—whether gentlemen intend to prevent the payment of this debt? We are told, in reply, that they do not expect to make the distribution until that debt shall have been paid; but they desire to have an inquiry made by a committee. Sir, I think I understand gentlemen. I admire their skilful tactics: they desire to bring the subject before the public; to examine the direct interests of the people; to speak of grand plans of internal improvements and of education; to sound the tocsin that the new States are about to take all the public lands, when they were purchased by the "common blood and treasure of the country;" and in this way to excite a prejudice which will demand that the distribution shall be immediately made. The supporters of the resolution will then have accomplished the double object of preventing in part the payment of the public debt, of fixing upon the new States a system of grinding oppression in relation to these lands, and that of preventing any liberal mode being adopted for disposing of these lands.

The people of the new States have a just ground of complaint, that this Government is more close and rigid, in regard to the disposition of these lands, than any other Government on earth. They justly contend that the Government had lost sight of the chief object, that of settling the country, and looks mainly to the money that is to be made from its own citizens. We ask you to give us relief from a system which annually drains the new States of their circulating medium—a system which will for ever keep them poor. Although the graduation has been by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] anathematized in its very birth, we respectfully press the justice of that measure. We ask that the minimum price of the lands may be suited to their quality, or that a reduction may be made; but we pray you not to adopt the principle of this resolution. If this be done, it will be considered the interests of the people of the old States not only to relax their present system, but to adopt one more onerous. They will force their representatives here to act as a set of heartless speculators, wringing from the poor cultivator of the soil the last cent of his earnings. It is in vain that gentlemen say to us, adopt this our system of distribution, and we will give you a liberal system of disposing of these lands. We know that when their system shall have been fixed upon us, we cannot escape. According to the famous report of the committee at the last session, "a more rigid economy" will be then adopted in regard to these lands. Yes, sir, I am one of those that fear that the main objects of the prime movers and supporters of this resolution are to fix upon us this rigid economy, to prevent the growth and settlement of the new States, and to keep their population at home.

Sir, another skilful movement is to be seen in the acts of the supporters of this resolution. They propose to distribute this fund for the purposes of education and internal improvements. When the distribution shall have been made, have we any power to control the disbursement of the money? Where is it to be found? May not the States appropriate it to any purposes they may choose? May they not apply it to the worst as well as the best objects? Nay, sir, may they not apply it to schemes in furtherance of the division of the Union, alluded to by the gentleman from Rhode Island? Sir, I understand the purposes named in the resolution as lures held out to decoy the friends of internal improvement and of education into a support of this plan—as drivers to whip this resolution through. I trust in God that useful knowledge is now spread over the great body of the people, to enable them to understand and properly estimate such wily schemes.

The prejudice of the people of the old States is most ungenerously attempted to be excited on this subject, by the pretence that the new States insist that the United States have no lands within their respective limits. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPENCER] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MALLARY] have urged this as a powerful reason for the adoption of this resolution. Now where is the evidence that any State has, by any act, set up such a claim? Has any State attempted to sell or use these lands? Has any State attempted to tax these lands? No, sir. What have they done? Some of their citizens have spoken of the operation of the constitution of the United States upon such lands of the United States as fell within the limits of any new State admitted into the Union. They have said that, by the principles of that constitution, the United States had no power conferred on them to hold lands within the limits of any State, unless it be of the description specified in the constitution; and they have said that power to hold these lands is not within the specification. This is the whole offence. No overt act is complained of; nothing is charged against us but the opinion of a few individuals; and yet gentlemen press this as a reason why this subject should be speedily acted on. Sir, when gentlemen attempt to assign reasons for their conduct, and can find no better than this, I think they justly excite a suspicion, at least, that they have a bad cause. Is this the argument by which they expect to convince those citizens that they are in error? Is this the course pursued to frighten us out of our constitutional opinions? I hope gentlemen have a better opinion of us. The member from Vermont [Mr. MALLARY] seemed so desirous of bringing this claim, as he calls it, before the nation, to excite prejudices, I suppose, that he has tortured and misconstrued the remarks which I had the honor to make the other day, and has represented me as alluding to certain "delicate questions" involved, by which he most gratuitously supposes I meant the claim of the new States. Sir, no such expression was used by me, nor did I make any remark which in the brain of any man could have justified the construction put upon it by the gentleman. I did allude to certain "difficult questions which were constantly arising on this floor" in reference to internal improvement; and this was expressed in a way distinctly to show my meaning.

Sir, as gentlemen have so vauntingly spoken of this pretended claim of certain citizens of the new States—as they have attempted to excite a prejudice among the good people of the Union, relying, no doubt, upon the presumption that nobody would voluntarily examine a question which he was told would unjustly deprive him of all his interest in a great stock, I will take it upon myself to state the argument, and ask gentlemen, if they please, to answer it—declaring at the same time that we use it only as an argument to convince the people of the old States that it is their interest to show more liberality towards the people of the new States in relation to these lands. I state further, sir, that the people whom I represent have too much regard for this Union, too much respect for the opinions and prejudices, if you please, of the people of the old States, to press a claim resulting to them from the constitution of the country, unless that charter, the charter of their own State, or the injustice and illiberality of the old States, should compel them to such a course. We do not believe that either constitution requires it at our hands.

I insist, sir, that it is an essential attribute of sovereignty in every independent State, that, whatever is public property within the State, should be controlled by that State. We contend that, under the present constitution of the United States, each State is entitled to all the rights of sovereignty which are not taken away by the federal constitution. We urge the doctrine that the General Government can hold no property within any State unless the power to do so be either expressly given, or so strongly implied as an auxiliary to such express grants of power, that the latter could not be fairly and beneficially exercised without such implied aids; that, in ascertaining these implied powers, the whole constitution should be looked to—the history of the times at which it was made should be regarded, thereby to ascertain the true intent, meaning, and objects of the framers of that instrument.

I do not suppose that the first two propositions will be denied; the last, therefore, is the only one involved in this discussion. We contend that no power is given by the constitution of the United States to hold property of this description within the limits of any State; and that when any State is admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the other States, (and it could be admitted in no other way,) all the lands belonging to the United States within the territorial limits of such State ipso facto become the property of such State. It is contended by gentlemen on the other side, that the second clause of the third section, article four, of the constitution of the United States puts this question to rest in their favor; and they will not permit it to be mooted. This claim provides that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." Now, sir, this provision, I admit, gives the United States full power over their territories, but it by no means follows that it authorizes them to hold lands within the States. And I have the high authority of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPENCER] to quote against him in this debate, that this clause "is clearly adapted to the territorial rights of the United States beyond the limits or boundaries of any of the States, and to their chattel interests."—See 17 Johnson's Rep. 225. Sir, to illustrate the gentleman's own former position, permit me to put a case. Suppose the United States, since the adoption of the present constitution, had, in extinguishing the Indian titles to lands within the limits of the State of New York, set up a claim under this clause to the lands so purchased, would not the State of New York have said, 'this is a question which "we will not permit to be mooted?"' The State of New York has all the sovereignty within her limits, which was not taken away by the federal constitution; and as no man in his senses can pretend that the clause in question takes away any such portion of sovereignty, would not this have been the answer of New York? Sir, the United States did, I believe, extinguish the Indian title to lands within that State, but no claim to property was set up.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] has attempted to answer the argument here before it had been urged. He declines giving us a definition of sovereignty, but contents himself by showing that, as the General Government can now hold property, and exercise exclusive legislation over it, too, within any of the old States, it therefore follows that the United States can hold the property in the public lands within the new States. Now, I would readily admit the force of the gentleman's conclusion, if the words "public lands," or any thing like them, had been inserted in the seventeenth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution, to which he has referred. That clause provides that Congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever," over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings. As the public lands are not included within any of the descriptions of property mentioned in this clause of the constitution, I put it to the gentleman to say whether there is any force in his argument. I had supposed that the enumeration of powers in the constitution excluded all those not enumerated, even those of a like kind; but the gentleman's argument seems to take the converse of the proposition as true—that all powers of a like kind, not enumerated, are given. He seems to urge further, that all human institutions of power are, in their very nature, limited; that, therefore, when the power of the State ends, that of the United States may well begin; and thus he attempts to show that the United States may properly hold these lands. To this I reply, that the power of the United States begins and ends precisely where the constitution has placed it.

It is contended, however, that, as the United States held a great portion of the Western territory at the time of adopting the federal constitution, the right of the United States to these lands is guaranteed by that clause of the constitution before cited, which provides that "nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." Now this clause surely does not secure the rights of the United States, more than it does those of any particular State. It secures all in their just rights, and leaves this question wholly untouched. Let the argument be worth what it may, it does not apply to Missouri or Louisiana, that country having been acquired since the adoption of the constitution. I am, therefore, not called on to answer it. But I am willing to meet the whole question, and will, in answer to this argument, show that it was the intention of the old Congress, of the framers of the federal constitution, and of the several States who made cessions of territory to the General Government, that all the States, whether old or new, should possess equal rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence. This principle pervades the whole of our constitution. It is to be found in almost every clause of that instrument, and yet it is almost wholly lost sight of in this debate.

In showing some of the acts of the old Congress bearing upon this subject, permit me to take up the history of the crown lands, just where the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] left it. He favored us with a clear and concise account of these lands, and the titles to them, until he came to the acts of our own Government, the acts of our own States, but not one word further. He acted as if he were approaching dangerous ground, "delicate questions," and principles established in better days, which would at once afford a triumphant refutation to the whole of his specious argument. I desire to present this view on another account. It will set the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPENCER] right on a very important point. That gentleman ridiculed the idea advanced by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TEST] that these lands were ceded by several of the States to the United States for the purpose of making new States. I will show that this was not only the intention of the States making cessions, but that the old Congress, before these cessions were made, gave a solemn pledge that the territory thus ceded should be formed into new States.

On the 6th September, 1780, a committee of the Congress reported, and the report was adopted, "That it appears more advisable to press upon those States which can remove the embarrassments respecting the Western territory, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims, since they cannot be preserved entire without endangering the stability of the confederacy; to remind them how indispensably necessary it is to establish the Federal Union on a fixed and permanent basis, and on principles acceptable to all its respective members; how essential to public credit and confidence, to the support of our army, to the vigor of our councils, and success of our measures; to our tranquillity at home, our reputation abroad, to our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people; that they are fully persuaded the wisdom of the respective Legislatures will lead them to a full and impartial consideration of a subject so interesting to the United States, and necessary to a happy establishment of the Federal Union."

A resolution was then adopted, urging the States to make the cession. Now, sir, can any man read this report without the reflection arising, that if the holding of extensive territories by any of the States endangered the confederacy, and made it unacceptable to all its respective members, that the same inequality now existing among the States should strongly plead in favor of any measure which should give all the States the right of soil to the public lands within their respective limits. If the inequality then endangered our tranquillity, "our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people," will not a like inequality now be attended with the same imminent danger? And does not this report afford powerful arguments to show that the new States should, in fact, be placed upon an equal footing with the old States? But this is not all, sir.

On the 10th October, 1780, and before any State had made a cession of its territory, the Congress, with a view of offering inducements to the making of these cessions, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States."

Here is a direct pledge that the lands shall be settled, and yet the main object of the Government seems to be to sell them for the highest price. Here is a solemn assurance that the territory shall be formed into distinct republican States, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States; and yet the other States have, and always have had, the right of soil in every foot of public land within their limits, and the new States are deprived of this right. Call you this equality in sovereignty, freedom, and independence? Is it admitted that the new States can extend their taxing power as far as the old States can extend their power of taxation? Is not the power of taxing all the property within the State, one of the essential rights of sovereignty in any State? The new States are deprived of this power; the old States possess it; and yet it is pretended that the new States have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the old States. Sir, the argument is preposterous; it strikes the mind of every man as fallacy, a mere delusion, to contend that, under circumstances like these, there is an equality of sovereignty.

I will refer to another act of the old Congress, to show their opinion upon a question like this. Yes, sir, I will refer to the principles of that Congress, although we seem to be much wiser than they. Would to God we were so, in truth and in fact; would to God we were half so disinterested, half so patriotic, half so pure. Sir, if some of us had caught the mantle of those departed worthies, we should seldom be found engaged in sectional conflicts. We should show ourselves worthy descendants of worthy ancestors. In 1778, the States of Rhode Island and of New Jersey objected to that article of the confederation, which provided "that no State shall be deprived of its territory for the benefit of the United States." These States offered amendments, going to vest in the United States the title to all the lands in every State which belonged to the crown at the commencement of the Revolution. They urged then, as the supporters of this resolution urge now, that as these lands were acquired by the united efforts of all the States, they should belong equally to all the States. That as they were acquired by the "blood and treasure" of the whole country, they should be disposed of for the common benefit of the whole country. The Congress, however, negatived the proposition. Now what are we to suppose were the principles of the Congress? Are we not irresistibly led to the conclusion that Congress considered it would be improper, unwise, and unequal, that the Federal Government should hold the right of soil to the public lands within any State; that such a course would interfere with the sovereignty of the States. This idea is irresistible, when we take into consideration the fact, that the proposition from Rhode Island and New Jersey was so modified as not to interfere with the jurisdiction of the respective States over public lands within their limits. This then is a full answer to the arguments of those who insist that, as we have the jurisdiction over these lands, we have all the essential rights of sovereignty. The old Congress did not think so; and every man must at once see that there is a material difference.

Let me now examine the compacts between the United States and the States that made cessions of territory. In the deed of cession made by Virginia in 1784, of the vast extent of country northwest of the Ohio, it was, among other things, provided "that the territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into States, and that the States so formed shall be distinct republican States, and admitted members of the federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom and independence as the other States. North Carolina incorporated the same provision in her deed of cession; and in the Louisiana treaty, by which we acquired the extensive territory west of the Mississippi, a provision substantially the same was inserted. The new States formed out of these territories have been admitted into the Union upon an equal footing in name with the other States; and yet it is contended that the General Government can rightfully hold the right of soil in much the greatest portion of the lands within their respective limits; and this, too, without any warrant of constitutional authority against the opinion and pledge of the old Congress, against the compact with the States making the cession, and against the provision of a solemn treaty, the supreme law of the land.

Sir, it is said that the new States have entered into compacts with the General Government not to interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within their limits, and not to tax the unsold lands in those States. To this I reply that no compact with the General Government, by any State, is binding on either party, which contemplates the granting of powers inconsistent with the constitution. If it were otherwise, the constitution might be, in effect, changed every day. It is said that, as these lands were acquired by the blood and treasure of our common country, the people of every State have an equal share in them, and therefore it is unjust in the new States to set up this claim. Is it not much more unjust, much more dangerous, more corrupting, in the people of the old States to claim the exercise of power and right over these lands, not granted by the constitution? Missouri, however, made no compact about the primary disposition of the soil. She made no compact about the right to tax the unsold lands within her limits. But it is said that these lands were ceded and acquired to be a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, and that this is a full reply to the supposed claim set up by the States. Is it no benefit to these United States, that each State should be equal in its sovereignty, freedom, and independence? Is there no use or benefit which is not a pecuniary one? I have always considered, sir, that there was more use and benefit in preserving, in their original purity, the true principles of the Government, than in drawing to the Government any power by which its moneyed interests were benefited.

I have now, sir, stated the argument which I promised; I have stated it as it presented itself to my mind, and I again request gentlemen to answer it. The member from Rhode Island, (Mr. BUNGER) who has attempted to answer my argument before it was spoken, says, when opinions cannot be sustained by facts, men resort to some metaphysical dogmas, by which facts may be removed out of their way. He seems to think that this course has been pursued in this instance. To this I reply that it is generally the case, when men cannot fairly answer an argument, they attempt to mystify and destroy it, by pretending it is metaphysical and fallacious. The gentleman is welcome, heartily welcome, to this sort of triumph, if it affords him any gratification.

I cannot dismiss this part of the subject without taking some notice of the course invariably pursued by those who have of late argued constitutional questions involving the powers of the Government. When they, both liberals and restrictionists, find themselves in a train of reasoning, equally applicable to the question of the right of the Government to hold these lands, as to the question about which they are debating, they take care to put in a proviso, saying they do not intend their principles to be applied to the public domain. That, they say, depends on different principles. But they take care not to state those principles. Sir, if there be one evil more to be deprecated in this Government than another; if there be any political sin deserving the greatest punishment, it is the sin of permitting our supposed pecuniary interests, and the supposed pecuniary interests of those we represent, to control our opinions in deciding great constitutional questions. We have indeed fallen on evil times, when we see questions involving the very existence of the Union, endangering the peace and happiness of the people, decided with direct reference to the interests of a particular section of the country, disregarding, too, the welfare of other sections; trampling under foot their own constitution, to accomplish, in most cases, an imaginary benefit. In these days, sir, constitutional questions are discussed before the people of this nation, by appealing to them to say whether it is not best for their particular pecuniary interest that the question should be decided either for or against the measure. This, sir, is the powerful argument. I trust, however, that such arguments will have no force in the present case.

Sir, if it should be considered that these considerations are without force, I am ready to meet gentlemen on their own principles. They insist that the acquisition of these lands, made at the expense of the whole Union, not only in treasure but in blood, marks a property equally extensive in them. That those lands being the common property of all the people, the proceeds thereof should be equally divided among the people. They contend, furthermore, that a great portion of these lands was acquired in a successful contest with Great Britain, by all our citizens, and therefore the proceeds should be equally divided. I will not stop to inquire whether the patriots of the Revolution were influenced in that contest by the consideration of the wealth in wild lands they were acquiring. I will not ask whether they were not moved by matters of higher value; but I say to gentlemen, your argument proves too much. If the crown lands acquired by the several States in our revolutionary struggle, belong equally to the people of the whole Union; if the proceeds of the public lands now should be equally divided among the people of all the States, ought not the proceeds arising from the sales of such of the crown lands as fell within the present limits of many of the old States to be equally divided also? Sir, equality is equity. If it be just and right that the old States should have a part of the lands in the new States, it is equally just and right that the people of the new States should have a share of the public lands which fell within the limits of the old States. In almost every State in this Union, according to their present boundaries, there were public or crown lands at the close of the Revolution. Each State disposed of these lands for her own interest. The State of New York retained nearly all her western lands to which she had title, and has disposed of it for her own aggrandizement. Upon the principle now contended for, should not the whole of the western part of that State have been disposed of for the benefit of all the people of the Union? The General Government has aided in extinguishing the Indian title to lands within that State, solely for the benefit of the State. Connecticut, too, reserved a tract of country, one hundred and twenty miles square, in the State of Ohio, and disposed of it for her own benefit. No, sir, she did not reserve this tract, for then she would not have had any title to it. She relinquished a shadow of a claim to the country northwest of the Ohio, and, instead of making a reservation of the tract mentioned, she demanded a warranty deed for it from the General Government, after Virginia had magnanimously ceded the whole country to the United States. Her title was a good one; that of Connecticut with scarcely the shadow of a foundation. Ought not Connecticut to render an account of the proceeds of this tract before she can with any grace ask for an equal division of the other lands? The State of Massachusetts, like Connecticut and New York, very liberal in making cessions of territory to which she had no title, took care to reserve all her public lands within the then district now State of Maine, and disposed of it for her own use. Since Maine was admitted into the Union, she and Massachusetts have been in copartnership in the public lands within the State of Maine, and have been and now are engaged in selling these lands for about five cents per acre. Now let it be remembered that these lands were acquired, not by these two States alone, but by the blood and treasure of the whole country. Should not these proceeds be equally divided, too? The States of Maine and Missouri were admitted into the Union at the same time. In each of them were large bodies of land acquired by the blood and treasure of the whole country. The lands in Missouri have been sold and are now selling at a high price for the benefit of the General Government. The lands in Maine are sold for her own benefit to her own citizens for a few cents per acre, and yet the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BRUNGS] complains that we desire to pass the graduation bill, which will reduce the price of refuse lands in Missouri to twenty-five cents per acre. He presses this resolution also, which is to give the State of Maine seven times as much of the proceeds of the public lands within the State of Missouri, as the latter State would have. This is not all, sir. The State of Maine invites population, by selling lands for a few cents per acre, while the population of Missouri must give at least one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and very frequently a great deal more, or not acquire lands. Do not these things prove too much for gentlemen? The old States kept their crown lands within their limits, because the old Congress thought that the Federal Government should not hold lands within any State. These States have sold theirs as they chose, and now are anxious to have another equal share. Sir, Pennsylvania kept her crown lands, and sold them as she pleased. Will that generous State now join in this cry for a division? The State of Kentucky had all the lands within her limits, save what was covered by Virginia military warrants. She has caused it to be settled and sold; and will the people of that State now ungenerously unite with the supporters of this resolution? The State of Tennessee had two hundred thousand acres of land, besides six hundred and forty acres in every six miles square, granted her at one time; and afterwards the whole of the public lands were given to her, except those lying in the extreme western and southwestern part of the State. Will that State join in the persecution against the new States? Will one of her delegation vote for this resolution? I hope not, sir. If she should file in, I hope she will account for what she has already received.

If I do not mistake, sir, the Government has, within the last ten years, extinguished the Indian title to lands in Tennessee, for the benefit of that State, and she has been selling them for a few cents per acre.

North Carolina ceded a great extent of territory, making, however, many provisos in her own favor; and the territory so ceded has been chiefly appropriated to the citizens of that State who settled in Tennessee, and who had military land claims in the latter State. The General Government has received but little, if any, pecuniary interest from the cession. Will the people of North Carolina, under these circumstances, support this resolution? Can they support it without abandoning their constitutional principle, and without giving up their character for disinterestedness and liberality? I think not, sir. The State of Georgia ceded her territory, it is true; but it was for a fair consideration paid. The lands recently acquired by the United States for the State of Georgia are about to be equally divided among her citizens without charge. Will she support this resolution? I know she cannot. The State of Virginia, if her good old principles permitted her, might, without reproach, insist on a share of the public lands. This State, as has been justly said, always foremost in acts of magnanimity, generosity, and patriotism, will not for any consideration, much less for the paltry one of a few thousand dollars, abandon her principles, and unite in a system which is to corrupt the best principles and sentiments of the people.

Sir, is it just or equitable that this division should be made according to representation in this House? Is it fair that we should look to the present generation alone, and not to posterity at all? The State of Missouri is nearly equal in territorial extent to the whole of New England. She is capable of sustaining a population equally great. You sell all the public lands in the new States in a few years; Missouri gets one-fortieth part as much as New England; education and internal improvements are well provided for in New England, but better aided in Missouri; and the fund is gone. How is Missouri in aftertimes to be placed on an equal footing with the New England States? The inequality is much more glaring, when we again look to the State of New York. This State reserved all the crown lands within her limits; she retained that great, fertile, and extensive country towards her western frontier. She has sold it and settled it, and thereby gained an immense population. This population, having grown up on a part of the public domain, and which they used for their own benefit, now comes in for an equal share of the residue. Sir, this State should be amongst the last in this Union to press this measure. It is unjust, unequal, and inequitable. The same remarks will well apply to Connecticut, to Massachusetts, and to Maine.

There is another objection to the proposed division. Gentlemen urge that, as the public lands are a common fund, to be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, it is just and proper that the proceeds should be equally distributed. I will not stop to raise the objection, that, by the very terms of the resolution of Congress of the 10th October, 1780, and the terms used in the acts of cession of the several States, the conclusion is irresistible, that this fund should be used and disbursed by the General Government itself, for the common benefit, and thence deduces another conclusion, that the individual States should not control it for their common benefit; nor shall I insist that this division will put it in the power of each State to use this fund, not for the common benefit.

But I take leave to advert to the terms of cession used by Virginia and North Carolina, for the purpose of raising a different objection. And here, sir, permit me to thank the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILBE] for turning my attention to that which might otherwise have escaped me. In the deed of cession made by Virginia, it is provided that the lands thus ceded "shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation or federal alliance of said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever." North Carolina made the same provision. I have already shown that this clause provided that this fund was especially set apart to defray the current expenses of the General Government; that, until this fund should be exhausted in paying those expenses, no other burdens of taxation should be put upon the States, and thence came to the conclusion that Congress had no power to divert this fund from its original object. I now contend, sir, that the proposed distribution is wholly inconsistent with the recited compact. At the time this compact was made, each State furnished its share of the general expenditure, according to white population, and three-fifths of all others, excluding Indians not taxed. Then the proportion of each State could be easily ascertained. Now, that the General Government is supported by indirect taxation, by duties and imports, how are we to ascertain "the usual respective proportions" of each State "in the general charge and expenditure?" It cannot be done, sir. And until this be done, no distribution can be made, according to the principles of this compact. Shall we guess at the usual proportions? Will it be pretended, at this day, that every State, south and west of Maryland, including the latter, does not pay a greater proportion of the revenue, according to the basis of population, than any State north of Maryland?

Let me illustrate my position by a supposed case. Suppose not one cent of the revenue, paid into the common treasury, should be expended, and a division of that revenue should be made among all the States, according to the principles laid down in this resolution, according to representation on this floor. Will any gentleman contend that the States south and west of the line mentioned would receive in this distribution as much as they paid? I presume not, sir. How, then, can the proposed distribution be made according to the compact? This is a difficulty which gentlemen cannot surmount.

Sir, let me examine another principle advanced in this debate in support of the resolution. Divest the argument of gentlemen of all its tissue—all its decorations—all its sophistry, and it amounts to this: the distribution must be made, because we have the fund in our power; because we want it applied for the purposes of education and internal improvement—because it is a common fund, and because the funds of the Government should, in equity and justice, be disbursed equally among all the citizens of the Union. Now, sir, I admit that the last reason assigned looks very pretty in theory; but if I show that the principle is wholly impracticable—that the practice of the Government has not been on this principle; if I prove that, upon this principle, the new States have not had their share of the funds of the General Government, I take from gentlemen the basis of their eloquent arguments, and the fair, the alluring, and beautiful fabric erected by them tumbles into the dust.

With the permission of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS] I beg leave to appropriate a part of his argument to illustrate my views on this subject. That gentleman, in resisting with me the amendment to this resolution, offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN] which provides that the new States shall, in this distribution, be compelled to account for all the lands given them by the General Government for any purpose whatever, very properly urged that, if the new States were to be called on to account for these lands so given, they, with the same propriety, might call the States on the Atlantic board to account for all moneys of the Government disbursed within their limits, either for naval purposes, military purposes, objects of internal improvement, breakwaters, or any purpose whatever, then to strike the balance and pay over. Now, sir, if the general principle be true, that the funds of the Government are to be divided equally among all the States, and the proceeds of the public lands are to be so divided, I demand, upon the same principle, that the new States—the States of the West and Southwest—shall be remunerated for their proportion of those enormous disbursements made on the seaboard. If the principle is to be carried out—if equality and justice are to prevail, I am very sure that, upon this general division, the new States will not complain on the score of interest, however much they might object on principle. It cannot be denied that the same States have not had their share of the disbursements of the Government. They know, however, that the principle is impracticable. They know that the united interests, the national interests of all the States will not, in all cases, permit it; therefore, they do not complain. But they ask of the old States to imitate their spirit of liberality, and not to ask for the application of the principle in relation to the public lands.

Sir, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] has said that his State has a right to be heard in this debate. I do not deny this right. He has said, that, according to the receipts at the custom-house at New Orleans, each of the nine Western States pays only about sixty thousand dollars per annum of the public revenue, and that Rhode Island pays five times as much. Does the gentleman suppose that all the revenue paid by the Western States is paid at New Orleans? I appeal to the gentlemen around me, from the West, to say whether the duties on the one-hundredth part of the merchandise consumed in the West, and on which they pay the duty, is paid at New Orleans. What becomes of the imports which come coastwise to that city? Where is the great amount of goods carried from the Eastern cities over land to the West? But, sir, I thank the gentleman from Rhode Island for another argument which he urged against the amendment. He insisted that the new States should not be called to an account for the donations of land made them, because the people of those States had, by their industry and enterprise, given all the value to the public lands which they ever possessed. He urged that they had caused lands which were not worth more than three cents per acre to be worth a dollar per acre. He told us, also, that the public lands had cost the Government about thirty millions of dollars, and that the Government had realized out of these lands about forty millions of dollars. Sir, the gentleman, in his last estimate, has a little exceeded the true amount, but it is true that the Government has received more in money than it has paid for these lands. It is true that, by the industry and enterprise of the West, lands which were not worth three cents per acre, are now worth one dollar per acre. Nay, sir, lands that were once not worth three cents per acre, have been sold by the Government for from five to ten dollars per acre; and all this was effected by the industry and perseverance of Western citizens. Yes, sir; the West has not only repaid you for their lands more than the lands cost you, but they have paid their full share of the expenses of the Government, their full share of the national debt, and they have contributed their full share, "not only in treasure, but in blood," to sustain our national character—to add to your national grandeur. Their "darling daughters," as the gentleman from Rhode Island pleased to call them, have never been unmindful of the interests of this Union. In the hour of peril and trial, they have shown their fidelity to this Union. And, if the Union is to be divided some time next summer, I assure the gentleman from Rhode Island that posterity will not point the finger of scorn to these "darling daughters," and say, you have blasted the reputation of your virtuous mothers. Sir, I speak for the people whom I represent, when I say there is not a people under the sun who are more devoted to their Government, to the Union, than the people of Missouri.

But to return to the resolution. I have said that, if this plan be carried into effect, the people of the new States may bid adieu to the prospect of ever having the title of the United States extinguished. We shall then have the rigid system of public speculators fixed upon us; we shall then have sales of alternate sections made, so that the sale and improvement of one may enhance the value of the other. Sir, while gentlemen have been indulging in their fine feelings of philanthropy—while they are pressing this resolution forward, with a view of disseminating useful knowledge among the people, I am surprised that a little consideration should not have been bestowed on the thousands of poor non-freeholders in the several States, and in the old States, too. Would not they gladly settle and improve your wild lands? You cannot, forsooth, enable them to acquire a home by reducing the price of the public lands, and thus elevate them to the rank of the most useful and happy citizens; but you propose to educate them in poverty and starvation, and thus you sharpen their sensibilities, and make them less able to sustain themselves under their own insignificance and degradation. When we reflect on these things, sir, is it unreasonable to suspect that gentlemen are desirous of emptying the public treasury, so that they may fill it in a way more to their liking? May we not well suppose, with the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS] that the friends of this resolution know there is in this Union a tax-paying people, and then a tax-consuming people? May we not tremble for the principles of our Government when we see appeals to that description of population to support this measure, who will support it because one dollar is paid into one pocket without considering that two are taken out of the other? But the other day the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICHARDSON] to undertake a system of education by this Government, was rejected upon the ground, as we all supposed, that the Government had no power over the subject. So soon, however, as a division of money among the States is proposed to effect the same object, gentlemen turn immediately round in its support. They are willing to do indirectly what they dare not do directly.

Sir, if there be gentlemen here who desire to ease the treasury of its masses of wealth, I beg leave to recommend that they pay the just claims upon this Government. If they are at any loss to know what is to be done with their money, I point them to the war-worn soldier of the Revolution, and say, pay that debt of justice and of gratitude. Sir, when I see a poor old soldier of the Revolution penniless, houseless, comfortless; when I listen to his tales of heroic valor, and witness the ardor of his patriotism, and, at the same time, reflect on the wild, splendid, and expensive schemes of this Government, I have turned away with a bleeding heart, and blushed for the honor of my country.

Another reflection has occurred to me. I look upon the system proposed to be established by this resolution, as an anti-emigration system—a system which is intended to check the growth of the West. Has it come to this, sir? We have had American systems—anti-slavery systems—and systems, the Lord knows what; and now we are to have an anti-emigration system to cripple the West, and to prevent the poor of the East from going to the West, and cultivating the fertile lands of the West. Money is to be divided among them at home—they are to be educated at home, and, I suppose, starve at home. Do you fear the increased and increasing power of the West? I hope not. That power is your power; it is the power of the whole country, and should not be feared by any part.

Sir, I have done. I have spoken what I believed to be the sentiments of the people whom I serve. I believe they cannot be bought up in the support of this resolution by any sum, much less the paltry and pitiful sum which would fall to their share under this distribution. I beg pardon of the committee for thus detaining them. But coming, as I do, from a new State—being the sole representative of a new State, whose interests I think are vitally interested, I felt myself constrained to enter into this discussion.

THE JUDICIARY.

The bill establishing Circuit Courts and abridging the jurisdiction of the District Courts in the districts of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, the eastern district of Louisiana, and the southern district of Alabama, being under consideration,

Mr. BUCHANAN rose, and said:

Mr. Chairman: It becomes my duty to present to this committee the reasons which induced the Committee on the Judiciary to report the bill to the House which has just been read. In rising to discharge this duty, I feel conscious that the subject is in its nature dry and uninteresting; but its importance demands the attention of every member of this committee. In vain may we pass the most wise and salutary laws, unless we provide an efficient judiciary to carry their blessings and their benefits home to the people. Without such a judiciary, they remain a dead letter upon our statute book.

This bill proposes no new theory—no untried experiment. It pursues the course which has been sanctioned by long experience. The Committee on the Judiciary did not seek to be wiser than those who have gone before us. This bill, therefore, provides nothing new for the old States of the Union. It merely extends to the new Western States that judicial system which has been found to be fully adequate to administer justice to all the States east of the Alleghany.

Before I proceed to illustrate the necessity of this measure, it is perhaps proper that I should briefly present to the committee some of the prominent points of the judicial history of the United States. Our present system was called into existence by the judicial act of September, 1789; and it demonstrates the wisdom and sagacity of the Congress of that day, that they should, at the very first attempt, have adopted a system, which, with but few alterations, has stood the test of an experience of forty years. Under that act, the United States was divided into thirteen districts, for each of which a district judge was appointed, who was required to reside therein, and to hold a court to be called a district court. These district courts were entirely independent of each other. Eleven of these thirteen districts, consisting of the eleven States which were then members of the Union, were divided into three circuits. These were called the eastern, the middle, and the southern circuits. The eastern circuit was composed of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York; the middle, of the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia; and the southern, of the States of South Carolina and Georgia. The remaining districts of Maine and Kentucky, not then members of the Union, were not embraced in any circuit; but their district courts were invested with the powers of a circuit court.

JAN. 14, 1830.]

The Judiciary.

[H. of R.]

Under this act, the Supreme Court of the United States consisted of a chief justice and five associate justices.

In each district of these three circuits, a circuit court was directed to be held twice in each year, to be composed of any two justices of the Supreme Court, and the judge of the district.

In June, 1790, the States of Rhode Island and North Carolina, and in March, 1791, that of Vermont, came into the Union. The districts of Rhode Island and Vermont were attached to the eastern, and that of North Carolina to the southern circuit.

The committee will observe, that the act of 1789 did not assign the justices of the Supreme Court to particular circuits, but intended that they should alternate in holding their circuit courts. It was soon found to be impracticable for them to perform the circuit duties required by this act. Under its operation, the six justices of the Supreme Court, besides the performance of their duties in bank, were required, in pairs, to hold circuit courts twice in each year, throughout the three circuits which embraced all the States of the Union. In 1792, they addressed the President of the United States upon the subject, who laid their communication before Congress. This produced the act of March, 1793, which declared that any one of the justices of the Supreme Court, with the judge of the district, should compose the circuit court. This act, by dividing their duties, diminished their circuit labors one half, and enabled them, without difficulty, to attend all the circuit courts.

Thus the Judiciary of the United States continued to be organized until the passage of the famous act of February 1801. This act produced great excitement throughout the country at the time of its passage, and met with strong public disapprobation. It withdrew the justices of the Supreme Court from the performance of circuit duties, and made them exclusively an appellate tribunal. Under its provisions, the United States were divided into six circuits, and three judges were appointed for each of the first five of these circuits. For the sixth circuit, which consisted of the districts of East and West Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio, only one circuit judge was appointed; who, together with the district judges of Tennessee and Kentucky, composed the court for that circuit. The district courts throughout this circuit were abolished, and their duties were transferred to the circuit court. Such was the provision which this act made for the performance of these circuit duties, which had been ably and satisfactorily discharged by the six justices of the Supreme Court previous to its passage.

The act of 1801 had but a brief existence. It was swept from the statute book in little more than one year after it became a law, by the repealing act of March, 1802. All the judges created under it were thus legislated out of office. This has been called a high-handed proceeding, and it is one which ought never to be resorted to except in extreme cases; but yet, in my opinion, experience has justified the measure, and has proved that such an extreme case then existed. But more of this hereafter.

In April, 1802, the judicial system was re-organized, and placed upon the foundation on which it now rests. The old thirteen States, together with Vermont, were divided into six circuits, the first composed of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island; the second, of the States of Connecticut, New York, and Vermont; the third, of New Jersey and Pennsylvania; the fourth, of Maryland and Delaware; the fifth, of Virginia and North Carolina; and the sixth, of South Carolina and Georgia. These circuits have ever since continued the same, except that Maine, since its admission into the Union, has been annexed to the first circuit. This act was the first which assigned to each justice of the Supreme Court a particular circuit. From the passage of the judicial act of 1789, until that of April, 1802, the justices of the Supreme Court alternated and travelled over all the circuits. Since that time, each one of them has been confined to a single circuit. The act of 1802 proceeded still further, and recognised the principle that the justices of the Supreme Court ought to reside within their respective circuits. At the date of its passage, four of the justices resided within the circuits to which it assigned them. Upon the resignation of Mr. Justice Moore in 1804, whose residence was in the fifth, but who was assigned to the sixth circuit, the present Mr. Justice Johnston was appointed his successor. Ever since that time, all the justices of the Supreme Court have resided within their respective circuits, except the late Judge Washington. And of that lamented judge, permit me to say; that although he was the citizen of a State out of the limits of his circuit, yet his judicial character was held in as high estimation by the people of Pennsylvania, as will be that of any man who shall probably ever become his successor.

Kentucky, which became a State of the Union in 1792, and Tennessee in 1796, were not embraced within the circuits created by the act of 1802. Each of them continued to have a district court, which, in addition to the ordinary powers of such a court, was invested with the jurisdiction of a circuit court. Ohio became a member of the Union in 1802; and, in February, 1807, Congress established a seventh circuit, to consist of the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio. Under this act, a sixth associate justice of the Supreme Court was appointed, to reside within the seventh circuit, and to hold the circuit courts. This circuit has always been too extensive, and the duties of the judge have ever been too laborious to be performed by any one man.

After the passage of the act of 1807, each of the eighteen States which then composed the Federal Union, were provided with a circuit court. That act, in this respect, placed them all upon an equal footing.

Since the year 1807, six new States have been added to the Union: Louisiana, in 1812; Indiana, in 1816; Mississippi, in 1817; Illinois, in 1818; Alabama, in 1819; and Missouri, in 1821.

The purpose of this bill is to extend the circuit court system to these new States; and, in doing so, to make such an arrangement of the two new circuits which it proposes to establish, as will enable the courts to transact the business of the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

Before I proceed to discuss the merits of this bill, it is necessary, to a correct understanding of the subject, that I should present to the committee the great outlines of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States.

I need scarcely repeat, that they are composed of one of the justices of the Supreme Court and the judge of the district in which they are held. They do not possess original jurisdiction in any case, unless the sum in controversy exceeds five hundred dollars. Above that amount they have unlimited original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, in which the United States are plaintiffs, or in which an alien is one party, and the citizen of a State the other; or in which the controversy is between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another State. If an alien be sued in a State court by any State or the citizen of a State, or if the citizen of another State be sued in a State court by a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought, the defendant in either case may remove the cause into the circuit court of the United States. The jurisdiction of the circuit court also extends to controversies between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States; and causes of this nature may be removed by either party from the courts of the States into the circuit court. Besides this extended original jurisdiction, the circuit courts are courts of appeal, in which the judgments and decrees of the district courts may be reviewed, in all civil cases in which the sum in controversy exceeds fifty dollars. When we consider that the district courts "have exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," this single branch of their power must be the fruitful source of many appeals to the circuit courts.

The judgments or decrees of the circuit courts are final and conclusive in all cases in which the amount in controversy does not exceed two thousand dollars, unless when the two judges who compose them are divided in opinion upon some point which may have arisen during the trial.

The circuit courts also possess exclusive original jurisdiction of all crimes of an aggravated nature committed against the United States; and they have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of all other offences. Their judgments in all criminal cases are conclusive, unless the judges are divided in opinion. If there has been such a division between them, either in a civil or criminal case, the point of disagreement may be certified to the next Supreme Court for a final decision.

Having thus given a hasty sketch of the history of the Judiciary of the United States, and of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts which this bill proposes to extend to the six new States of the Union, I shall now proceed to present the views of the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to this important subject. In doing this, I feel that, before I can expect the passage of the bill, I must satisfy the committee, first, that such a change or modification of the present judiciary system ought to be adopted, as will place the Western States on an equal footing with the other States of the Union; and, second, that the present bill contains the best provisions, which, under all the circumstances, can be devised for accomplishing this purpose.

And first, in regard to the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. It may be said that the existing law has already established circuit courts in these three States, and why then should they complain? In answer to this question, I ask gentlemen to look at a map of the United States, and examine the extent of this circuit. The distance which the judge is compelled to travel, by land, for the purpose of attending the different circuit courts, is, of itself, almost sufficient, in a few years, to destroy any common constitution. From Columbus, in Ohio, he proceeds to Frankfort, in Kentucky; from Frankfort to Nashville; and from Nashville, across the Cumberland mountain, to Knoxville. When we reflect that, in addition to his attendance of the courts in each of these States, twice in the year, he is obliged annually to attend the Supreme Court in Washington, we must all admit that his labors are very severe.

This circuit is not only too extensive, but there is a great press of judicial business in each of the States of which it is composed. In addition to the ordinary sources of litigation for the circuit courts throughout the Union, particular causes have existed for its extraordinary accumulation in each of these States. It will be recollected that, under the constitution and laws of the United States, the circuit courts may try land causes between citizens of the same State, provided they claim under grants from different States. In Tennessee, grants under that State and the State of North Carolina, for the same land, often come into conflict in the circuit court. The interfering grants of Virginia and Kentucky are a fruitful source of business for the circuit court of Kentucky. These causes, from their very nature, are difficult and important, and must occupy much time and attention. Within the Virginia military district of Ohio, there are also many disputed land titles.

Another cause has contributed much to swell the business of the circuit court of Kentucky. The want of confidence of the citizens of other States in the judicial tribunals of that State, has greatly added to the number of suits in the circuit court. Many plaintiffs, who could, with greater expedition, have recovered their demands in the courts of the State, were compelled, by the impolitic acts of the State Legislature, to resort to the courts of the United States. Whilst these laws were enforced by the State courts, they were disregarded by those of the Union. In making these remarks, I am confident no representative from that patriotic State will mistake my meaning. I rejoice that the difficulties are now at an end, and that the people of Kentucky have discovered the ruinous policy of interposing the arm of the law to shield a debtor from the just demands of his creditor. That gallant and chivalrous people, who possess a finer soil and a finer climate than any other State of the Union, will now, I trust, improve and enjoy the bounties which nature has bestowed upon them with a lavish hand. As their experience has been severe, I trust their reformation will be complete. Still, however, many of the causes which originated in past years, are yet depending in the circuit court of that State.

In 1826, when a similar bill was before this House, we had the most authentic information that there were nine hundred and fifty causes then pending in the circuit court of Kentucky, one hundred and sixty in the circuit court for the western district, and about the same number in that for the eastern district of Tennessee, and upwards of two hundred in Ohio. Upon that occasion, a memorial was presented from the bar of Nashville, signed by G. W. Campbell as chairman, and Felix Grundy, at present a Senator of the United States, as secretary. These gentlemen are both well known to this House, and to the country. That memorial declares that "the seventh circuit, consisting of Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee, is too large for the duties of it to be devolved on one man; and it was absolutely impossible for the judge assigned to this circuit to fulfil the letter of the law designating his duties. Such has been the delay of justice in the State of Tennessee, that some of the important causes now pending in their circuit courts are older than the professional career of almost every man at the bar."

The number of causes depending in the seventh circuit, I am informed, has been somewhat reduced since 1826; but still the evil is great, and demands a remedy. If it were possible for one man to transact the judicial business of that circuit, I should have as much confidence that it would be accomplished by the justice of the Supreme Court to which it is assigned, as by any other judge in the Union. His ability and his perseverance are well known to the nation. The labor, however, both of body and mind, is too great for any individual.

The Judiciary.

[H. of R.]

Has not the delay of justice in this circuit almost amounted to its denial? Are the States which compose it placed upon the same footing in this respect, with other States of the Union? Have they not a right to complain? Many evils follow in the train of tardy justice. It deranges the whole business of society. It tempts the dishonest and the needy to set up unjust and fraudulent defences against the payment of just debts, knowing that the day of trial is far distant. It thus ruins the honest creditor, by depriving him of the funds which he had a right to expect at or near the appointed time of payment; and it ultimately tends to destroy all confidence between man and man.

A greater curse can scarcely be inflicted upon the people of any State, than to have their land titles unsettled. What, then, must be the condition of Tennessee, where there are many disputed land titles, when we are informed, by undoubted authority, "that some of the important causes now pending in their circuit courts are older than the professional career of almost every man at the bar." Instead of being astonished at the complaints of the people of this circuit, I am astonished at their forbearance. A judiciary, able and willing to compel men to perform their contracts, and to decide their controversies, is one of the greatest political blessings which any people can enjoy; and it is one which the people of this country have a right to expect from their Government. The present bill proposes to accomplish this object, by creating a new circuit out of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. This circuit will afford sufficient employment for one justice of the Supreme Court.

Without insisting further upon the propriety, nay, the necessity, of organizing the circuit courts of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, in such a manner as to enable them to transact the business of the people, I shall now proceed to consider the situation of the six new States, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, and Missouri. Their grievances are of a different character. They do not so much complain of the delay of justice, as that Congress have so long refused to extend to them the circuit court system, as it exists in all the other States. As they successively came into the Union, they were each provided with a district court and a district judge, possessing circuit court powers. The acts which introduced them into our political family declare that they shall "be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever." I do not mean to contend that by virtue of these acts we were bound immediately to extend to them the circuit court system. Such has not been the practice of Congress, in regard to other States in a similar situation. I contend, however, that these acts do impose an obligation upon us to place them "on an equal footing with the original States," in regard to the judiciary, as soon as their wants require it, and the circumstances of the country permit it to be done. That time has, in my opinion, arrived. Louisiana has now been nearly eighteen years a member of the Union; and is one of our most commercial States; and yet, until this day, she has been without a circuit court. It is more than thirteen years since Indiana was admitted; and even our youngest sister, Missouri, will soon have been nine years in the family. Why should not these six States be admitted to the same judicial privileges which all the others now enjoy? Even if there were no better reason, they have a right to demand it for the mere sake of uniformity. I admit this is an argument dictated by State pride; but is not that a noble feeling? Is it not a feeling which will ever characterize freemen? Have they not a right to say to us, if the circuit court system be good for you, it will be good for us? You have no right to exclusive privileges. If you are sovereign States, so are we. By the terms of our admission, we are perfectly your equals. We have long submitted to the want of this system, from deference to your judgment; but the day has now arrived when we demand it from you as our right. But there are several other good reasons why the system ought to be extended to these States. And, in the first place, the justices of the Supreme Court are selected from the very highest order of the profession. There is scarcely a lawyer in the United States who would not be proud of an elevation to that bench. A man ambitious of honest fame ought not to desire a more exalted theatre for the display of ability and usefulness. Besides, the salary annexed to this office is sufficient to command the best talents of the country. I ask you, sir, is it not a serious grievance for those States to be deprived of the services of such a man in their courts? I ask you whether it is equal justice, that whilst, in eighteen States of this Union, no man can be deprived of his life, his liberty, or his property, by the judgment of a circuit court, without the concurrence of two judges, and one of them a justice of the Supreme Court, in the remaining six the fate of the citizen is determined by the decision of a single district judge? Who are, generally speaking, these district judges? In asking this question, I mean to treat them with no disrespect. They receive but small salaries, and their sphere of action is confined to their own particular districts. There is nothing either in the salary or in the station which would induce a distinguished lawyer, unless under peculiar circumstances, to accept the appointment. And yet the judgment of this individual, in six States of the Union, is final and conclusive, in all cases of law, of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where in the amount of the controversy does not exceed two thousand dollars. Nay, the grievance is incomparably greater. His opinion in all criminal cases, no matter how aggravated may be their nature, is final and conclusive. A citizen of these States may be deprived of his life, or of his character, which ought to be dearer than life, by the sentence of a district judge; against which there is no redress, and from which there can be no appeal.

There is another point of view in which the inequality and injustice of the present system, in the new States, is very striking. In order to produce a final decision, both the judges of a circuit court must concur. If they be divided in opinion, the point of difference is certified to the Supreme Court, for their decision; and this, whether the amount in controversy be great or small. The same rule applies to criminal cases. In such a court, no man can be deprived of life, of liberty, or of property, by a criminal prosecution, without the clear opinion of the two judges that his conviction is sanctioned by the laws of the land. If the question be doubtful and important, or if it be one of the first impression, the judges, even when they do not really differ, often agree to divide, pro forma; so that the point may be solemnly argued and decided in the Supreme Court. Thus, the citizen of every State in which a circuit court exists, has a shield of protection cast over him, of which he cannot be deprived, without the deliberate opinion of two judges; whilst the district judge of the six new Western States must alone finally decide every criminal question, and every civil controversy in which the amount in dispute does not exceed two thousand dollars.

In the eastern district of Louisiana, the causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction decided by the district court must be numerous and important. If a circuit court were established for that State, a party who considered himself aggrieved might appeal to it from the district court in every case in which the amount in controversy exceeded fifty dollars. At present there is no appeal, unless the value of the controversy exceeds two thousand dollars; and then it must be made directly to the Supreme Court, a tribunal so far remote from the city of New Orleans, as to deter suitors from availing themselves of this privilege.

I shall not further exhaust the patience of the committee on this branch of the subject. I flatter myself that I have demonstrated the necessity for such an alteration of the existing laws, as will confer upon the people of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and of the six new Western States, the same benefits from the judiciary, as those which the people of the other States now enjoy.

The great question, then, which remains for discussion is, does the present bill present the best plan for accomplishing this purpose, which, under all circumstances, can be devised? It is incumbent upon me to sustain the affirmative of this proposition. There have been but two plans proposed to the Committee on the Judiciary, and but two can be proposed, with the least hope of success. The one an extension of the present system, which the bill now before the committee contemplates, and the other a resort to the system which was adopted in the days of the elder Adams, of detaching the justices of the Supreme Court from the performance of circuit duties, and appointing circuit judges to take their places. After much reflection upon this subject, I do not think that the two systems can be compared, without producing a conviction in favor of that which has long been established. The system of detaching the judges of the Supreme Court from the circuits has been already tried, and it has already met the decided hostility of the people of this country. No act passed during the stormy and turbulent administration of the elder Adams, which excited more general indignation among the people. The courts which it established were then, and have been ever since, branded with the name of the "midnight judiciary." I am far from being one of those who believe the people to be infallible. They are often deceived by the arts of demagogues: but this deception endures only for a season. They are always honest, and possess much sagacity. If, therefore, they get wrong, it is almost certain they will speedily return to correct opinions. They have long since done justice to other acts of that administration, which at the time they condemned; but the feeling against the judiciary established under it remains the same. Indeed, many now condemn that system, who were formerly its advocates. In 1826, when a bill, similar in its provisions to the bill now before the committee, was under discussion in this House, a motion was made by a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] to recommit it to the Committee on the Judiciary, with an instruction so to amend it, as to discharge the judges of the Supreme Court from attendance on the circuit courts, and to provide a uniform system for the administration of justice in the inferior courts of the United States. Although this motion was sustained with zeal and eloquence and ability by the mover, and by several other gentlemen, yet, when it came to the vote, it was placed in a lean minority, and, I believe, was negative without a division. It is morally certain that such a bill could not now be carried. It would therefore have been vain and idle in the Committee on the Judiciary to have reported such a bill. If the Western States should be doomed to wait for a redress of their grievances, until public opinion shall change upon this subject, it will, probably, be a long time before they will obtain relief.

But, sir, there are most powerful reasons for believing that public opinion upon this subject is correct. What would be the natural consequences of detaching the judges of the Supreme Court from circuit duties? It would bring them and their families from the circuits in which they now reside; and this city would become their permanent residence. They would naturally come here; because here, and no where else, would they then have official business to transact. What would be the probable effect of such a change of residence? The tendency of every thing within the ten miles square is towards the Executive of the Union. He is here the centre of attraction. No matter what political revolutions may take place, no matter who may be up or who may be down, the proposition is equally true. Human nature is not changed under a republican Government. We find that citizens of a republic are worshippers of power, as well as the subjects of a monarchy. Would you think it wise to bring the justices of the Supreme Court from their residence in the States, where they breathe the pure air of the country, and assemble them here within the very vortex of Executive influence? Instead of being independent judges, scattered over the surface of the Union, their feelings identified with the States of which they are citizens, is there no danger, that, in the lapse of time, you would convert them into minions of the Executive? I am far, very far, from supposing that any man, who either is or who will be a justice of the Supreme Court, could be actually corrupted; but if you place them in a situation where they or their relatives would naturally become candidates for Executive patronage, you place them, in some degree, under the control of Executive influence. If there should now exist any just cause for the complaints against the Supreme Court, that in their decisions they are partial to federal rather than to State authority, (and I do not say that there is,) that which at present may be but an imaginary fear might soon become a substantial reality. I would place them beyond the reach of temptation. I would suffer them to remain, as they are at present, citizens of their respective States, visiting this city annually to discharge their high duties, as members of the Supreme Court. This single view of the subject, if there were no other, ought in my judgment to be conclusive.

Let us now suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the withdrawal of the justices of the Supreme Court from their circuit duties, and their residence in this city, would produce no such effects, as I apprehend, upon the judges themselves; what would be the probable effect upon public opinion? It has been said, and wisely said, that the first object of every judicial tribunal ought to be to do justice; the second, to satisfy the people that justice has been done. It is of the utmost importance in this country that the judges of the Supreme Court should possess the confidence of the public. This they now do in an eminent degree. How have they acquired it? By travelling over their circuits, and personally showing themselves to the people of the country, in the able and honest discharge of their high duties, and by their extensive intercourse with the members of the profession on the circuits in each State, who after all are the best judges of judicial merit, and whose opinions upon this subject have a powerful influence upon the community. Elevated above the storms of faction and of party which have sometimes lowered over us, like the sun, they have pursued their steady course, unawed by threats, unseduced by flattery. They have thus acquired that public confidence, which never fails to follow the performance of great and good actions, when brought home to the personal observation of the people.

Would they continue to enjoy this extensive public confidence, should they no longer be seen by the people of the States, in the discharge of their high and important duties, but be confined, in the exercise of them, to the gloomy and vaulted apartment which they now occupy in this capitol? Would they not be considered as a distant and dangerous tribunal? Would the people, when excited by strong feeling, patiently submit to have the most solemn acts of their State Legislatures swept from the statute book, by the decision of judges whom they never saw, and whom they had been taught to consider with jealousy and suspicion? At present, even in those States where their decisions have been most violently opposed, the highest respect has been felt for the judges by whom they were pronounced; because the people have had an opportunity of personally knowing that they were both great and good men. Look at the illustrious individual who is now the Chief Justice of the United States. His decisions upon constitutional questions have ever been hostile to the opinions of a vast majority of the people of his own State; and yet with what respect and veneration has he been viewed by Virginia? Is there a Virginian, whose heart does not beat with honest pride when the just fame of the Chief Justice is the subject of conversation? They consider him, as he truly is, one of the greatest and best men which this country has ever produced. Think ye that such would have been the case, had he been confined to the city of Washington, and never known to the people, except in pronouncing judgments in this capitol, annulling their State laws, and calculated to humble their State pride? Whilst I continue to be a member of this House, I shall never incur the odium of giving a vote for any change in the judiciary system, the effect of which would, in my opinion, diminish the respect in which the Supreme Court is now held by the people of this country.

The judges whom you would appoint to perform the circuit duties, if able and honest men, would soon take the place which the judges of the Supreme Court now occupy in the affections of the people; and the reversal of their judgments, when they happened to be in accordance with strong public feeling, would naturally increase the mass of discontent against the Supreme Court.

There are other reasons, equally powerful, against the withdrawal of the judges from the circuits. What effect would such a measure probably produce upon the ability of the judges themselves to perform their duties? Would it not be very unfortunate?

No judges upon earth ever had such various and important duties to perform, as the justices of the Supreme Court. In England, whence we have derived our laws, they have distinct courts of equity, courts of common law, courts of admiralty, and courts in which the civil law is administered. In each of these courts, they have distinct judges; and perfection in any of these branches is certain to be rewarded by the honors of that country. The judges of our Supreme Court, both on their circuits and in bank, are called upon to adjudicate on all these codes. But this is not all. Our Union consists of twenty-four sovereign States, in all of which there are different laws and peculiar customs. The common and equity law have thus been changed and inflected into a hundred different shapes, and adapted to the various wants and opinions of the different members of our confederacy. The judicial act of 1789 declares "that the laws of the several States, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide," shall be regarded as rules of decision in the courts of the United States. The justices of the Supreme Court ought, therefore, to be acquainted with the ever-varying codes of the different States.

There is still another branch of their jurisdiction, of a grand and imposing character, which places them far above the celebrated Amphictyonic council. The Constitution of the United States has made them the arbiters between conflicting sovereigns. They decide whether the sovereign power of the States has been exercised in conformity with the constitution and laws of the United States; and, if this has not been done, they declare the laws of the State Legislatures to be void. Their decisions thus control the exercise of sovereign power. No tribunal ever existed, possessing the same, or even similar authority. Now, sir, suppose you bring these judges to Washington, and employ them in bank but six weeks or two months in the year, is it not certain that they will gradually become less and less fit to decide upon these different codes, and that they will at length nearly lose all recollection of the peculiar local laws of the different States? Every judicial duty which each of them would then be required to perform, would be to prepare and deliver a few opinions annually in bank.

The judgment, like every other faculty of the mind, requires exercise to preserve its vigor. That judge who decides the most causes, is likely to decide them the best. He who is in the daily habit of applying general principles to the decision of cases, as they arise upon the circuits, is at the same time qualifying himself in the best manner for the duties of his station on the bench of the Supreme Court.

Is it probable that the long literary leisure of the judges in this city, during ten months of the year, would be devoted to searching the two hundred volumes of jarring decisions of State courts, or in studying the acts of twenty-four State Legislatures? The man must have a singular taste and a firm resolution, who, in his closet, could travel over this barren waste. And even if he should, what would be the consequence? The truth is, such knowledge cannot be obtained; and after it has been acquired, it cannot be preserved, except by constant practice. There are subjects which, when the memory has once grasped, it retains for ever. It has no such attachment for acts of Assembly, acts of Congress, and reports of adjudged cases, fixing their construction. This species of knowledge, under the present system, will always be possessed by the judges of the Supreme Court; because, in the performance of their circuit duties, they are placed in a situation in which it is daily expounded to them, and in which they are daily compelled to decide questions arising upon it. Change this system, make them exclusively judges of an appellate court, and you render it highly probable that their knowledge of the general principles of the laws of their country will become more and more faint, and that they will finally almost lose the recollection of the peculiar local systems of the different States. "Practice makes perfect," is a maxim applicable to every pursuit in life. It applies with peculiar force to that of a judge. I think I might appeal for the truth of this position to the long experience of the distinguished gentleman from New York, now by my side, [Mr. SPENCER.] A man, by study, may become a profound lawyer in theory, but nothing except practice can make him an able judge. I call upon every member of the profession in this House to say whether he does not feel himself to be a better lawyer at the end of a long term, than at the beginning. It is the circuit employment, imposed upon the judges of England and the United States, which has rendered them what they are. In my opinion, both the usefulness and the character of the Supreme Court depend much upon its continuance.

I now approach what I know will be urged as the greatest objection to the passage of this bill—that it will extend the number of the judges of the Supreme Court to nine. If the necessities of the country required that their number should be increased to ten, I would feel no objection to such a measure. The time has not yet arrived, however, when, in my opinion, such a necessity exists. Gentlemen, in considering this subject, ought to take those extended views which belong to statesmen. When we reflect upon the vast extent of our country, and the various systems of law under which the people of the different States are governed, I cannot conceive that nine or even ten judges are too great a number to compose our appellate tribunal. That number would afford a judicial representation upon the bench of each large portion of the Union. Not, sir, a representation of sectional feelings or of the party excitements of the day, but of that peculiar species of legal knowledge necessary to adjudicate wisely upon the laws of the different States. For example, I ask what judge now upon the bench possesses, or can possess, a practical knowledge of the laws of Louisiana? Their system is so peculiar, that it is almost impossible for a man to decide correctly upon all cases arising under it, who has never been practically acquainted with the practice of their courts. Increase the number of judges to nine, and you will then have them scattered throughout all the various portions of the Union. The streams of legal knowledge peculiar to the different States will then flow to the bench of the Supreme Court as to a great reservoir, from whence they will be distributed throughout the Union. There will then always be sufficient local information upon the bench, if I may use the expression, to detect all the ingenious fallacies of the bar, and to enable them to decide correctly upon local questions. I admit, if the judges were confined to appellate duties alone, nine or ten would probably be too great a number. Then there might be danger that some of them would become mere non-entities, contenting themselves simply with voting aye or no in the majority or minority. There would then also be danger that the Executive might select inefficient men for this high station, who were his personal favorites, expecting their incapacity to be shielded from public observation by the splendid talents of some of the other judges upon the bench. Under the present system we have no such danger to apprehend. Each judge must now feel his own personal responsibility. He is obliged to preside in the courts throughout his circuit, and to bring home the law and the justice of his country to his fellow-citizens in each of the districts of which it is composed. Much is expected from a judge placed in his exalted station; and he must attain to the high standard of public opinion by which he is judged, or incur the reproach of holding an office to which he is not entitled. No man in any station in this country can place himself above public opinion.

Upon the subject of judicial appointments, public opinion has always been correct. No factious demagogue, no man, merely because he has sung hosannas to the powers that be, can arrive at the bench of the Supreme Court. The Executive himself will always be constrained by the force of public sentiment, whilst the present system continues, to select judges for that court from the ablest and best men of the circuit; and such has been the course which he has hitherto almost invariably pursued. Were he to pursue any other, he would inevitably incur popular odium. Under the existing system, there can be no danger in increasing the number of the judges to nine. But take them from their circuits, destroy their feeling of personal responsibility by removing them from the independent courts over which they now preside, and make them merely an appellate tribunal, and I admit there would be danger, not only of improper appointments, but that a portion of them, in the lapse of time, might become incompetent to discharge the duties of their station.

But, sir, have we no examples of appellate courts consisting of a greater number than either nine or ten judges, which have been approved by experience? The Senate of the State of New York has always been their court of appeals; and, notwithstanding they changed their constitution a few years ago, so much were the people attached to this court, that it remains unchanged. In England, the twelve judges, in fact, compose the court of appeals. Whenever the House of Lords sits in a judicial character, they are summoned to attend, and their opinions are decisive of almost every question. I do not pretend to speak accurately, but I doubt whether the House of Lords have decided two cases, in opposition to the opinion of the judges, for the last fifty years. In England, there is also the court of exchequer chamber, consisting of the twelve judges, and sometimes of the lord chancellor also, into which such causes may be adjourned from the three superior courts, as the judges find to be difficult of decision, before any judgment is given upon them in the court in which they originated. The court of exchequer chamber is also a court of appeals, in the strictest sense of the word, in many cases which I shall not take time to enumerate.

I cannot avoid believing that the prejudice which exists in the minds of some gentlemen, against increasing the number of the judges of the Supreme Court to nine, arises from the circumstance that the appellate courts of the different States generally consist of a fewer number.

But is there not a striking difference between the cases? It does not follow that because four or five may be a sufficient number in a single State where one uniform system of laws prevails, nine or ten would be too many on the bench of the Supreme Court, which administers the laws of twenty-four States, and decides questions arising under all the codes in use in the civilized world. Indeed, if four or five judges be not too many for the court of appeals in a State, it is a strong argument that nine or ten are not too great a number for the court of appeals of the Union. Upon the whole, I ask, would it be wise in this committee, disregarding the voice of experience, to destroy a system which has worked well in practice for forty years, and resort to a dangerous and untried experiment, merely from a vague apprehension that nine judges will destroy the usefulness and character of that court, which has been raised by seven to its present exalted elevation?

It will, no doubt, be objected to this bill, as it has been upon a former occasion, that the present system cannot be permanent, and that, ere long, the judges of the Supreme Courts must, from necessity, be withdrawn from their circuits. To this objection there is a conclusive answer. We know that the system is now sufficient for the wants of the country, and let posterity provide for themselves. Let us not establish courts which are unnecessary in the present day, because we believe that hereafter they may be required to do the business of the country.

But, if it were necessary, I believe it might be demonstrated that ten justices of the Supreme Court will be sufficient to do all the judicial business of the country, which is required of them under the present system, until the youngest member of this House shall be sleeping with his fathers. Six judges have done all the business of the States east of the Alleghany mountains, from the adoption of the federal constitution up till this day; and still their duties are not laborious. If it should be deemed proper by Congress, these fifteen Eastern States might be arranged into five circuits instead of six, upon the occurrence of the next vacancy in any of them, without the least inconvenience either to the judges or to the people; and thus it would be rendered unnecessary to increase the bench of the Supreme Court beyond nine, even after the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the Union. The business of the federal courts, except in a few States, will probably increase but little for a long time to come. One branch of it must, before many years, be entirely lopped away. I allude to the controversies between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants from different States. This will greatly diminish their business both in Tennessee and Kentucky. Besides, the State tribunals will generally be preferred by aliens and by citizens of other States for the mere recovery of debts, on account of their superior expedition.

I should here close my remarks, if it were not necessary to direct the attention of the committee for a few minutes to the details of the bill. And here permit me to express my regret that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] has thought proper to propose an amendment to add three, instead of two, judges to the Supreme Court. Had a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary believed ten judges, instead of nine, to be necessary, I should have yielded my opinion, as I did upon a former occasion, and given the bill my support in the House. This I should have done, to prevent division among its friends, believing it to be a mere question of time: for ten will become necessary in a few years, unless the number of the Eastern circuits should be reduced to five.

[Here Mr. WICKLIFFE asked if it were in order to refer to his amendment, as it was not yet before the committee.]

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he would not further refer to it at present. The bill proposes to create one new circuit out of Mississippi, the eastern district of Louisiana, and the southern district of Alabama. Nature has limited these three districts. They cannot be separated without violence. There is a communication by water, between Natchez, New Orleans, and Mobile, the places at which the circuit courts will be held for the whole distance, which is always safe and expeditious. No other arrangement could have been made, unless Alabama had been connected with Tennessee; and that would have been extremely inconvenient. I have a certificate from the Post Office Department in my possession, stating the distance from Nashville to Mobile to be four hundred and thirty-nine miles. The road is not good, the streams are not bridged, and it passes through a new country, and part of the way through an Indian nation. In order to attend the circuit court at Mobile, the judge would be compelled to travel over this road, from a healthy into a sickly climate, twice in each year, a total distance of one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six miles; and this, when he could reach Mobile, either from Natchez or New Orleans, by water, in two or three days.

The circuit court cannot be removed from Mobile, and placed nearer to Nashville. It is there that admiralty and maritime causes arise and must be decided in the district court; from which an appeal is allowed to the circuit court. It is at that commercial point the citizens of Alabama chiefly come into contact in their commercial transactions with the citizens of other States and with foreigners; and there the chief civil business of the circuit court must arise. But, above all, it is there, near the verge of the Gulf of Mexico, where offences against the United States committed upon the high seas must be tried and punished.

Kentucky and Tennessee, under this bill, compose the other new circuit; and however reluctant these States may be to go together, I do not perceive how they can be separated, without imposing more labor upon some one of the Western judges than he ought to be called upon to perform.

In regard to the other Western circuit, consisting of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, I admit that it will embrace a large extent of territory. I am sorry for it, but it cannot be avoided. We ought, however, to consider that, if the judge shall be compelled to travel much, a great part of it will be by water. He will have but little business to transact in any of the States of which it is composed, except Ohio. It is probable, too, that ere long public convenience will suggest the removal of the circuit courts of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois from the seats of government of those States to the Ohio river; and I am at a loss to conceive any good reason why the circuit court of Missouri should not be held at St. Louis.

After all, I regret that necessity has compelled the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill, which, if it should pass, will impose so much travel on the judge of the seventh circuit. No man would be more disposed to relieve that distinguished individual from unnecessary labor than myself. I feel confident he will never complain. The man who, by the exertion of great ability, incessant labor, and untiring perseverance, brought the Post Office Department from chaos into order, will never shrink from the performance of any duty required of him by his country.

Another remark, and I have done. This bill does not provide a circuit court for the western district of Louisiana, and the northern district of Alabama. In this respect, these districts are placed upon the same footing with the northern district of New York, the western district of Pennsylvania, and the western district of Virginia. I possess no actual information concerning the amount of business in the northern district of Alabama; but from its position it cannot be great. I have the best information that there is but little business in the western district of Louisiana. At all events, neither Louisiana nor Alabama will complain, when they are placed upon the same footing with New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 15, 1830.

The House was this day chiefly occupied in the consideration of private bills.
Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1830.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th of December ultimo: when

Mr. HUNT modified his said resolution, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the nett annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States and Territories for the purposes of education and internal improvements, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN, on the 17th December ultimo, to amend the said resolution, by inserting after the word "Territories," these words, "the amount and value of public lands given by Congress to any State, or to public and private institutions in any State."

Mr. SPEIGHT said that, when this subject was first brought to the consideration of the House, he had not intended to have participated in the debate; but in consequence of the amendment which had been offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, and the disposition which gentlemen had manifested to meet the resolution at the threshold, he felt it his duty to submit a few remarks explanatory of the vote he should give. It might [said Mr. S.] at the first glance appear highly improper to arrest the progress of a proposition so simple in its character—one which simply proposed inquiry—but he contended it was the proper time for those opposed to the resolution to come forward, and show to the House the impropriety of the measure; but if, on the contrary, it should be deemed expedient, and finally should be adopted, it would go to the committee clothed with all the information a discussion could throw on it. Mr. S. said, there was still a stronger reason why he wished to express his sentiments in regard to the resolution. He said he had seen that the Legislature of the State from which he came had been engaged in discussing the same proposition which we have now before us; and whilst he had heard, with deep regret, that they had had the subject before them, he was more than gratified to see that they had consigned it to its mother dust, where (not envying its repose) he hoped it would sleep through a long eternity. He hoped that he should not be understood as speaking in the slightest degree disrespectful of that distinguished body, or that he denied the right of instruction. By no means; far be it from him. He had ever believed, and still believed, that Congress should reserve to themselves the control of their funds; and that in all works of improvement in which the aid of the Government is to be given, they should be the sole judges. Sir, [said Mr. S.] permit me for a moment to call the attention of the House to the purport of this resolution. It proposes to raise a select committee, to inquire into the expediency of dividing among the States, according to the ratio of representation in this House, a certain portion of its surplus funds, for education and internal improvements; and that these improvements be effected by the funds of the General Government, to be placed under the control of the State Legislatures; that we, the Representatives of the people, constituting what may be said to be a part of the Federal Government, have not judgment and discretion, yes, sir, nor honesty enough, to apply these funds. That we shall not be the judges of the legitimate scope to which we are privileged by the constitution to go; but that we will transfer our funds to the States, and that they may go without limit. This, sir, is the language, in substance, which this resolution is made to speak. Mr. S. said, the construction of the constitution might be classed into three divisions. There was one class which, following the express letter of the constitution, was necessarily precluded from exercising any other power than what was expressly delegated. On the other hand, there was another, which was for doing every thing not expressly prohibited. But, for my own part, whilst I would gladly avoid being considered one of those who concede no power by implication or construction, I would carefully avoid being of that number who construe the constitution to answer their own ends. I prefer a third class, who are for giving to the constitution a liberal interpretation; concede to it incidental powers which necessarily belong to those expressly delegated, and without which the constitution is a perfect dead letter. This Government, he conceived, was one of delegated powers; its limits were marked out. But, within these limits, its sphere of action was sovereign. It was clothed with a power to pass all laws which might be deemed necessary to carry its powers into effect. And [said Mr. S.] a power to carry on a well digested and judicious plan of internal improvement was as necessary to the efficiency of the Government as any other power. A system which had for its object the opening of water or land communications between the several States, for military or commercial purposes, should, at all times, when he had a voice, have his support. But, [said Mr. S.] I am in favor of the right of Congress to judge of the constitutionality of the improvement. He would not trust the States to judge for him, for no gentleman would contend that all works of internal improvement, carried on by the State, come within the constitutional powers of Congress. But, [said Mr. S.] after you have given the States this money, what assurance have you, on their part, that they will apply it as specified in your resolution? What control have you over the money after it is out of your possession? None, sir. Your money, which you have given to the States for education and internal improvement, may, when out of your control, be squandered upon objects not worthy the patronage of a State, much more a General Government. But [said Mr. S.] there is a still stronger objection to this policy. Can any gentleman be so blind as not to see the odious effect which this policy may have on the State Legislatures? Adopt this measure, and you make a majority of the State Legislatures subservient to the will of Congress. Any measure which the General Government might propose, would be responded to by the States, to court their favor and patronage. Sir, the true policy, in my opinion, for this country to pursue, is to keep the General and State Governments (I mean their influence) separate and independent. Again, sir, what a spectacle will this present to the world—a General Government set up in the capacity of a tax collector, not competent of its own judgment to carry on internal improvements, but which will furnish the States with money, and become their guardians! Sir, I confess my objections to the measure are not so much on constitutional grounds as on expediency, and I will proceed, in as few words as possible, to explain them. I contend that the public lands are pledged to pay the public debt, and that the general welfare of this country requires that this debt should be paid as speedily as possible.

After the war of the Revolution, and when the present Government went into operation, the United States had, for supplies and expenses incidental to the war, contracted a debt nearly to the amount of eighty millions of dollars, partly foreign and partly domestic. To reduce this credit, a plan was submitted to the then Secretary of the Treasury, which was adopted. And a part of the policy pursued by the administration was to create new loans, to extinguish the foreign, and to reduce the interest of the domestic debt. And to enable the United States to borrow this money, it absolutely became necessary to give a pledge or surety for the forthcoming of the same; and this led to the passage of the act of Congress of the 4th August, 1789, by which the sales of the public lands were pledged to reduce the public debt.

Suppose there had been no cession of the public lands, what, he asked, must have been the consequence? Direct taxation. For, without the public lands, the United States had no means whereby to redeem their loans. They could not have borrowed money to have redeemed the credit of the country, because they had no surety to pledge for the forthcoming of the funds. The constitution which they had adopted gives them no power to levy and collect imposts, further than to meet the contingent expenses of the Government. And [said Mr. S.] this is the precise light in which the States viewed the whole matter. They saw that, without a cession of their territory, direct taxation would follow, and they stepped forth in liberal and patriotic terms, and ceded their territory; and his bosom swelled with emotions indescribable, while recounting over the history of the cessions. It was the fact, that his native State stood foremost in the rank of liberality. Yes, sir; and what has she received? Nothing; and, I will add, nothing will she receive, unless she can obtain it on just and equitable terms; while some of those States which are clamorous for a division of the public land funds have contributed nothing. North Carolina, which has borne the burden and heat of the day, has remained silent. She needs the funds, but she wants them on honorable terms or none. North Carolina is in favor of internal improvements by the General Government, but she wants the funds judiciously applied. She has, for the last ten years, had the mortification to see her funds misapplied by unskilful managers, her funds frittered away, by embracing too many objects at once, for the money on hand. And just so will be the effect of this. By division, North Carolina will get about sixty thousand dollars; and this divided on all the objects to which the attention of the State is directed, will end a miserable abortion, like all the rest of her enterprises. Sir, the policy which this Government ought to pursue is, in a few words, this: Improve your inlets and harbors, make military roads; but when you do it, keep the control of your funds. What, he asked, was the use of the United States keeping a corps of military and topographic engineers, if they do not intend to carry on internal improvements? and, if you intend to carry on internal improvements, why give the States your money? How are you to work when your money is gone? Sir, you have no right to touch this public land fund, until the public debt is paid.

To show that I am not mistaken in the position which I have advanced, I beg leave to refer the House to the message of President Washington, in 1790.

MESSAGE OF 1790.

"Allow me, moreover, to hope that it will be a favorite policy with you, not merely to secure a payment of the interest of the debt funded, but, as far and as fast as the growing resources of the country will permit, to exonerate it of the principal itself. The appropriations you have made of the western lands explain your dispositions on this subject; and I am persuaded that the sooner that valuable fund can be made to contribute, along with other means, to the actual reduction of the public debt, the more salutary will be the measure to every public interest, as well as the more satisfactory to our constituents."

Again, sir, his message in 1791, which speaks in language more emphatic:

MESSAGE OF 1791.

"A provision for the sale of the vacant lands of the Distribution of Public Lands.

United States is particularly urged, among other reasons, by the important considerations that they are pledged as a fund for reimbursing the public debt; that, if timely and judiciously applied, they may save the necessity of burdening our citizens with new taxes for the extinguishment of the principal; and that, being free to discharge the principal, but in a limited proportion, no opportunity ought to be lost for availing the public of its right."

What, sir, I ask, would have been the situation of this country, if we had pursued the policy of the father of his country? Instead now of owing a debt of near fifty millions of dollars, we should have paid it years ago, and have saved the country near one hundred and fifty millions of dollars interest, which we have actually paid on the public debt since the year 1790.

But [said Mr. S.] it has been urged why this division should take place, that the sinking fund will, in a very few years, entirely reduce the public debt, and that therefore this resolution should pass. He should like to be informed what constituted the sinking fund. If he had understood the history of the sinking fund correctly, he thought the money derived from the sales of the public lands formed a part. Mr. S. said, Congress in their wisdom had devised a plan, whereby the public debt should be paid off in a few years. They had enacted (he spoke at present from report, for he had never read the law) that the sum of ten millions of dollars should annually be applied to the payment of the public debt, out of the sales of the public lands, and the duty on imports. And that, after the contingent expenses of Government had been paid, the balance (reserving two millions of dollars for contingencies) to be also applied. This, [said Mr. S.] in a few words, was what constituted the sinking fund. Now, [said Mr. S.] take away the proceeds of the public lands, and adopt the American system, to its full extent, as admitted by the gentleman from Rhode Island the other day, and where is your sinking fund? The gentleman has told us, in his remarks the other day, that the wish of the friends of the American system is to furnish the country with all the necessities of life, and stop importation. I will give his own words:

"He would briefly glance at another objection. It was said that this was a branch of the tariff policy, and that it would be supported as such by all tariff men. He would say in three words what the advocates of the American system require. That system proposes to supply the country with all the great staples from our own sources. The importation of those staples constitutes at present the great source of our public revenue. The friends of the American system know that, when that importation shall cease, the revenue from that source must be discontinued. He begged of the gentleman from Alabama to understand, that, when these importations shall cease, there will be no longer any revenue from foreign goods to our Government. If, then, the importation shall terminate, and with it the revenue, the friends of that system must wish to keep up a revenue from the sales of the public lands. If, therefore, the gentleman could imagine that any friend of the American system would support the resolution on the ground he had stated, it was more than he [Mr. B.] could imagine. If the gentleman supposed that he [Mr. B.] and the friends who voted with him were gifted with greater obloquy of intellect, or greater want of intelligence, than any other human beings, it was too much to accuse us of possessing both those disqualifications together."

Mr. S. said, he was not mistaken in his view of the wishes of the manufacturing States. This was just what he expected they had arrived at, and he would in a very few words call the attention of the House to what he conceived would be the effect of such an oppressive policy. It would operate precisely on the Southern States, as cords and bandages would, if applied to the human system. It would retard the circulation, and suddenly all the vital energies would become extinct.

What, sir, I ask all reflecting gentlemen to say, must be the inevitable result? Take the public lands away from the sinking fund—have a tariff sufficient to prohibit exportation, and I say, what, sir, is to be the result? Why, direct taxation! And, next to that, follows ruin to the Southern States; our slaves, our land, &c. will be taken and sold to pay the tax. Importation being stopped, it necessarily prohibits exportation, and our staple being cotton, just as much as is wanted for consumption, by the manufacturing States, will be bought at their own price, and the balance will sink with us. Sir, I was not prepared to hear such language uttered on this floor. I have always had my doubts as to the sincerity of the policy; now they are confirmed. I had hoped at this session we should so modify the American system as to unite all parties; but, sir, I must confess, all hopes now are lost. The gentleman from Rhode Island has gravely told us that he supposes the Union is to be divided next summer, and then we shall divide.

Sir, in the section of country from which I have the honor to come, I have heard no such intimation. Respectable meetings have been held in the Southern States, in which they have set forth their grievances, and urged a speedy redress. Justice, sir, is what the South wants; and justice she will have. And the gentleman from Rhode Island will pardon me for telling him, that should disunion of this empire take place, oppression and injustice will be the cause. And, sir, it is lamentable, if, after a bloody struggle with Old England to resist a three-penny tax per pound on tea, in which lives, property, and treasure were sacrificed, we must now burst asunder the political bands of this confederacy to resist an unconstitutional impost on the South, to support the pride and arrogance of New England. Sir, I pray God, none of these evils may befall us. I feel sorry that this subject has been unnecessarily lugged into this debate. But, sir, when I hear doctrines advanced on this floor, which sap the independence and liberty of the people, I feel bound to resist it. Yes, sir, regardless of consequences, I will do it. Mr. S. said he feared there was something contained in the body of the resolution, which was not expressed on the face of it. I hope, sir, it is not the result of any determination to further the cause of the tariff.

In regard to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, although he saw no very good effect it would have, yet he could not agree that its intention or effect was such as had been attributed to it by the gentlemen who had participated in the debate. He did not consider the amendment as intended to raise an account current between the old and the new States, and that the effect would be to require the new States to pay back, but on the contrary to ascertain, as near as possible, the amount they had received, and, should a division now take place, withhold from them a proportion which they might have received heretofore. Much [he said] had been said in regard to donations from the General Government to the States, for fortifications, &c. which, by the bye, he considered as foreign altogether from the subject under consideration. He would ask the gentleman from Rhode Island, if what was given to one member of the Union in a national point of view, was not so much given to the whole. That which contributes to the defence of his State, is properly the defence of the whole country. This was the correct view, he conceived, to be taken of the subject. Now, in regard to the donations of public land made to the new States, it was wholly different. They had received a large amount of this fund from the General Government, for the very purposes contemplated by this resolution; and the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is intended to require an account to be taken of what they had received—not to compel them to pay back, but, as he had before stated, in the division now proposed to hold back in proportion to what they have received. He considered the donations heretofore made, just what the General Government was by the terms of the cession bound to do. It was, if not expressly implied in all the cessions, that new States were to be formed out of the territory ceded to the General Government. We held out inducements to our people to remove to the new lands, and "we would do them good;" and for one he did not feel disposed to press them. They are bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh. They are our children. They have, in times of peril and danger, stood between us and the tomahawk and scalping knife, for which we owe them a debt of gratitude. They have protected us. And what we have done for them is but a small compensation for the hardships and toils they have endured for us. I hope, sir, we shall not now require them to pay us back what we have given them. Mr. S. said, if the division was to take place of what remains, he for one was willing for the new States to come in, and, regardless of what they have received, let them have their equal share. For these reasons, he hoped neither the resolution nor the amendment would be agreed to. He had heard no gentleman in the debate intimate that the division should take place until the public debt be paid. Then, and not until then, will be the proper time to talk about the division, for, until the debt should be paid, we in fact had no surplus funds. The President had manifested a desire to pay off the debt, and redeem the credit of the country; and he sincerely hoped that Congress would adopt no measure in relation to the pecuniary affairs of the country, that would thwart his views. The people of the country were responding to the views of the Chief Magistrate, and it afforded abundant proof that their sentiments were that the country should be out of debt. This country [said Mr. S.] (a majority) is composed of economical men, and they look upon it in the same light as they would with regard to individuals. They know it is the interest of the nation as well as individuals, to be out of debt. When, sir, the time shall have arrived (and he hoped it would speedily come) that the public debt shall be discharged, and he should have a voice in the councils of the nation, if the policy of the country require it, and the people should wish it, let a division of the surplus revenue take place. But, for one, he doubted the policy. It was the honest conviction of his mind, and ever had been, that this Government has authority to carry on works of internal improvement in a national point of view in the States, but that they should be the sole judges of the propriety of the work, and direct all appropriations for objects of that kind.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved that the resolution be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

And pending the question on this motion,

The previous question was called for by Mr. INGERSOLL, and was demanded by a majority of the members present.

The said previous question was then put, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas, 127—nays, 59.

So the House decided that the main question be now put.

The main question was then stated, that the House do agree to the resolution as herein before recited; when

Mr. HAMMONS called for a division of the question on the said resolution, the division to take place between the words "Territories" and the word "for."

The SPEAKER decided that the resolution was susceptible of this division.

From this decision of the Speaker, Mr. BARRINGER appealed to the House; and, after some brief debate on the question—'Is the decision of the Speaker correct?'

It passed in the affirmative.

The question was then put, Will the House agree to the first member of the said resolution, in the following words, viz.

And it was decided as follows: yeas, 113—nays, 70.

So the House agreed to this clause of the resolution.

A further division on the second member of the said resolution was then called for by Mr. BUCHANAN, so as that the question be taken separately on so much of the said resolution as is contained in these words, "for the purposes of education and internal improvement."

A further division of the question on the said second member of the said resolution was then called for by Mr. TAYLOR.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th December ultimo.

The question recurred on agreeing to that member or portion thereof, which is contained in the following words: "for the purposes of education;" and decided as follows: yeas, 98—nays, 84.

So this part of the resolution was agreed to.

The question was then put, Will the House agree to that member or portion of the said resolution which is contained in the following words: "and internal improvement?" and decided as follows: yeas, 92—nays, 94.

The question was then put, Will the House agree to that member or portion of said resolution which is contained in the following words: "in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives, with leave to report by bill or otherwise?" and decided as follows: yeas, 117—nays, 75.

So the first, second, and fourth members of the said resolution were agreed to by the House, and the third member thereof was rejected.

The resolution agreed to by the House is as follows:

"Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States and Territories for the purpose of education, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives; with leave to report by bill or otherwise."

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved that the House now go into Committee of the Whole, with the view of resuming the consideration of the Judiciary bill; but waived his motion at the request of

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, who desired to introduce in the House an amendment to the bill, that it might be ordered to be printed. The House gave leave for the reception of the amendment, which was ordered to be printed; and then

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and took up the Judiciary bill; the question being on the amendment thereto offered some days ago by Mr. STRONG, of New York.

Mr. STRONG rose, and proceeded to address the committee in support of his amendment. He had spoken about an hour, when the usual time of adjournment having arrived, he gave way for a motion to that effect.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1830.

CONDITION OF THE INDIANS.

The following resolution submitted to the House on the 13th instant by Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, and laid upon the table for one day, was taken up.

JAN. 20, 1830.]

Condition of the Indians.

[H. of R.]

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before the House a statement of the number, with the moral and political condition of any Indians located within the jurisdictional limits of the States of Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania, respectively: such statement to be accompanied by as critical a showing as can be furnished by the department, of the forms of government to which they have been heretofore and are now subjected, with the names of the respective tribes, which tribe or tribes (if any) have been, or are now, permitted to exercise the right of self-government, independent of the State or States in which they are located; and (if any) which tribe or tribes is, or are now, or have been subjected, in any degree, by the Government of the State or States in which they are located, to the municipal jurisdiction of such State or States; and the extent to which they may have been, or are now, so subjected."

Mr. STORRS, of New YORK, offered the following amendment:

Insert after the word "Indians," as follows: "residing on lands which they claim to hold or possess, under their native or original title; and."

Mr. STORRS said, that the bearing of the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. THOMPSON] was too plain to be misunderstood. The House could not fail to see, without any particular explanation, to what subject the information called for was expected to apply, and in what way it might possibly be used. It was therefore quite proper that the resolution should be so amended, as to bring from the War Department that kind of information, if any exists there, which may have some real application to any subject with which it may be hereafter supposed to have any connexion. There are many Indians [said Mr. S.] residing among the white population, cultivating their farms like others, distinct from any of their original tribes, and virtually incorporated into the body politic of the State of New York, and there were some tribes, too, in the State, who held their lands directly under the grant and authority of the State; there were others which had voluntarily surrendered their lands, and now held their possessions under compacts with the State. He thought it would be found, too, that the present relation of some of them to the State had been amicably settled long before the revolutionary war. He supposed that no one could desire to consult the Secretary of the War Department as to the political condition of any Indians of those classes. The House was quite as competent as that officer to form a correct opinion of their civil condition and their political relation to the State. If the War Department can furnish or procure for us any information as to those Indians who hold their lands under their native title, I shall certainly [said Mr. S.] throw no obstacle in the way of his researches. But I shall still think that we already have in our power quite as full and authentic historical materials as the War Department can find or furnish, to guide us to a safe conclusion on that subject. He hoped, therefore, that the gentleman from Georgia would think with him, that the adoption of the amendment would bring to the House a kind of information (if it should bring any at all) which would bear somewhat more directly on any question likely to come before the House, than the original resolution could furnish.

Mr. THOMPSON said that the gentleman from New York appeared to have widely mistaken the object of his [Mr. T.'s] resolution. He had seemed to suppose that it referred to New York alone; whereas, it not only specifically included several other States within its scope, but was manifestly intended to comprehend the whole question. Not [he observed] to refer simply to particular communities in New York, but to ascertain what had been the exercise of the rights of sovereignty within the various States, in reference to that important matter. If, for instance, the Secretary of War should, in reply to that resolution, inform the House that lands had been wrested from the Indians by violence, or obtained by duplicity, would not such a fact have an important bearing upon the discussion of a subject of such magnitude and importance, as the one then under discussion? The State of Georgia had been complained of on account of alleged cruelties to the Indians within her jurisdiction; and he wished to know whether any gentleman on that floor would say that Georgia should be subject to a rule to which others would not and ought not to submit. He might suppose a case, for example, of Indians having been sold for debt, and such a fact might be developed by the answer to this resolution. Was the gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] apprehensive of the information which it might be the means of eliciting? It was his [Mr. T.'s] sole wish to obtain such information as would lead them to some practical conclusion upon the subject, in order that they might be enabled to render even-handed justice. Although the gentleman from New York might be right in the position he had assumed, yet Mr. T. said that he could not be wrong in the view he had taken of the subject. If it should be the fact that Indian lands had not been improperly obtained, such would be apparent; and, on the contrary, if such were found to be the case, it would be made equally evident by the response of the Secretary to that resolution.

Mr. HOFFMAN, of New York, hoped the amendment would not be adopted. He would not hear the remarks of his colleague, and knew not the ground of his motion, but supposed the rule of law applied to those Indians who reside on lands the title of which had been extinguished, as well as to those on lands whose title was not extinguished. He, for one, believed that the sovereignty of the States over the Indians was not affected by either condition, and he hoped the resolution might be adopted in its fullest extent, and complete information be obtained relative to the moral and political condition of the Indians in all the States.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, expressed himself opposed to the resolution, as not, in his opinion, conducive to any valuable end. Many of the inquiries contained in it were of a merely speculative nature, on which difference of opinion might naturally exist between persons actuated by the same motives, and looking forward to the same object. The sources whence those opinions emanated were accessible to all; and why then should the Secretary of War be called upon to express an opinion which every member could best form for himself? Besides, the introduction of this resolution went to precipitate a discussion upon a subject which it was confessed by all was of the first importance, and upon which it was necessary, considering its extreme delicacy, and the consequences which might result from the decision upon it, that every member of the House should be prepared to enter into by a previous investigation of its merits. It would be brought forward, he would take it upon himself to say, before the House as speedily as possible by the Committee on Indian Affairs, at which period it could be with more propriety discussed. He, therefore, moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. FOSTER called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, but they were not granted by the House.

Mr. WAYNE preferred, should it meet the object of the gentleman from Tennessee that the resolution should be postponed to a day certain, instead of being laid on the table.

Mr. BELL said, he should be happy to accommodate the gentleman from Georgia, but it would not meet his object so well, as his wish was to put an end at once to what he deemed a premature and useless discussion.

The question was then put on laying the resolution on the table, and carried—101 to 62.

THE JUDICIARY.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and took up the bill to alter and extend the Judiciary system.

Mr. STRONG rose, and concluded his argument in support of his amendment.

[The remarks of Mr. STRONG were to the following effect:]

Mr. STRONG said, that, on most occasions, he was content to give a silent vote; but, on the present subject, so important in its character and consequences, and holding the opinions he did in regard to it, he hoped a departure from his accustomed rule would not be deemed improper.

The amendment which I have submitted, [said Mr. S.] the committee will recollect, proposes to transfer all the powers and duties of the circuit courts to the several district courts of the United States, and to require the justices of the Supreme Court, being thus relieved from their circuit duties, to hold annually two or more terms of that court. To avoid embarrassment in discussing the principle upon which the plan depends, I have purposely omitted some necessary provisions. These, however, should the plan be adopted, may be readily supplied, either here, or by sending the subject back to the Committee on the Judiciary. This amendment opens the whole field of debate. It does more. Contrasted with the bill, it presents plainly the two great alternatives, either to go on increasing the number of the justices of the Supreme Court, for the performance solely of mere incidental and subordinate duties, or to require, in another form, and of others, the performance of those duties. It seems clear to me that the federal judiciary must be organized upon the one or the other of these cardinal principles.

I suppose it will not be denied that the benefits of the federal judiciary ought to be extended equally to all the States, and to all the people. Any plan which falls short of this will be partial and unjust, because it will give to some, and deny to others, privileges which are common to all, and which all have an equal right to possess.

Nor do I think it will be denied, as a general rule, that the number of judges should be fixed with a sole view to the performance of those duties which cannot be performed by others, and the court so organized as to secure independence, soundness, and efficiency in its members. Any deviation from this rule ought to be sustained by clear and conclusive reasons.

The existing inequality in the distribution and character of the federal courts among the several States, may be remedied, either by adding to the number of justices on the bench of the Supreme Court, or by separating them from their circuit court duties. Now, sir, if the remedy be by addition, the first idea that forces itself upon the mind is, that we must add to the number until we get up to twenty-four, thus making the number of the justices of the Supreme Court equal to the whole number of States in the Union. Any less number will approach towards equality, but can hardly attain it. But if the remedy be by separation, perfect equality may be produced by the institution of independent circuit courts and judges, or by adopting the plan which I have proposed; that is, by transferring the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the circuit courts to the existing district courts.

As several of the Western States do not enjoy the benefit of circuit courts, which are common to the others, I shall take it for granted, without inquiring into the wants or desires of these new States, that this inequality ought to be remedied; because, when each State, in this respect, can be put upon a footing of perfect equality with every other, without any additional expense, without appointing any more judges, and without trying any new experiment, it is difficult to conceive any good reason why it should not be done.

Should the opinion prevail, that separate, independent circuit courts ought not to be adopted, it will seem to follow that we must take the plan proposed by the bill, with the certainty that the number of the justices of the Supreme Court will be increased beyond what convenience and efficiency require in performing their original and appellate duties; and with the further certainty that the desired equality will not be attained, or that we must take the plan proposed by the amendment, with the certainty that it will be simple, cheap, uniform, and efficient in its operation, and with the further certainty that it will produce exact equality in the order and administration of justice throughout the Union.

The alleged incompetency of some of the district court judges is no argument against the plan. Were the fact so, the fault would not be in the system. But there is no evidence of the fact. And the fair inference is, that they are able men, competent judges, and worthy of the high stations they occupy. And why should they not be? Their jurisdiction embraces more matters, and covers a larger field of property and of human life, than that of the circuit courts.

The honorable chairman, [Mr. BUCHANAN] after having described, in fresh colors, the deprivations and wants of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, contended that the circuit court system ought to be extended to those new States, in order that they might be put upon an equal footing with the older States of the Union. I have admitted that the benefits of the federal judiciary ought to be distributed equally among the twenty-four States. But, sir, does the bill do this? It clearly does not. It makes no provision for having one of the justices of the Supreme Court hold a circuit court in the northern districts of New York and of Alabama, or in the western districts of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Louisiana. These are left with district courts only; and this is certainly the more remarkable, as two of these districts are in the States for whose benefit and relief we are urged to pass the present bill. Without stopping, therefore, to inquire into the practical operation of the plan which the honorable gentleman proposes, it is apparent, on the face of it, that it does not do equal justice.

But we are again earnestly entreated by the honorable gentleman [Mr. B.] to pass this bill, because the decisions of the district courts, in the districts to which the circuit court system has not been extended, are, in certain cases, final and conclusive upon the property and life of the citizen. If there be any thing hard or unmerciful in this, the remedy is easy, and should be applied without delay. We should at once give an appeal in those cases, directly to the Supreme Court of the United States. This would obviate the evil, and is one answer to the argument. The bill, however, is exceedingly objectionable for another reason; it is partial and unequal. It withholds the circuit court system from five large districts, and thus leaves the property and lives of the citizens in these districts at the mercy of district court judges—thereby entailing upon a large portion of our fellow-citizens the very evils which the gentleman so eloquently deprecated. No such objection exists against the plan I have proposed. It removes all these evils; it presents an equal and uniform system; it carries this equality and uniformity into every part of the Union.

If I did not misapprehend the honorable gentleman, he seemed to take it for granted that the bill involved no new principle, that it merely extended the present circuit court system, which he told us had been sanctioned by long experience. Sir, plans may appear the same on paper, and yet widely differ in principle and practical results. Had he proposed to increase the number of the justices of the Supreme Court to one hundred, instead of nine, and to create a new circuit for each, would not the committee have instantly perceived that the plan, though the same to the eye, was founded upon a new principle, and for the attainment of purposes different from those which the framers of the present circuit court system designed? It appears to me that the bill contains a new principle. I may be wrong. And should the committee think I am wrong, still I hope they will bear with me, while I state some of the reasons which have led me to the conclusion, that, by passing the bill, we shall not only depart from the old, but shall adopt a new system, highly dangerous in its character and consequences.

The duties of the justices of the Supreme Court are of two distinct kinds. One kind consists of those duties which grow out of the original and appellate jurisdiction of the court, and which they must, and they only can, perform. These, therefore, are their principal duties. The other kind consists of those duties which Congress has, from time to time, imposed upon them, by requiring them to hold circuit courts. These duties are performed by them, not as justices of the Supreme Court, but as judges, of an anomalous character. These duties can and may be performed by others. They are, in fact, now performed by some one or other of the district court judges. It seems, therefore, too plain to be controverted, that these duties are merely and wholly incidental and subordinate to their principal duties.

Now, sir, the honorable gentleman having relieved me from the trouble of proving that the justices of the Supreme Court are sufficiently numerous, by distinctly admitting that seven, the present number, are enough, and that nine would be too many for the convenient and efficient performance of their original and appellate duties, does it not follow that this new court, of nine, is to be created for the purpose avowedly of performing those duties which, we have seen, are merely and wholly incidental and subordinate, and which may be performed by others? The present court is admitted to be large enough for the business of the bench. Wherefore increase the number of the justices? If you do increase the number, do you not depart from the old, and adopt a new system, resting upon a new principle? What is this but changing the principle into the incident—thereby making the secondary duties of the old court the main object and excuse for creating the new court? Ought we not to pause before we adopt a plan which, while it fails to produce the desired equality among the States, may prove fatal to the soundness and efficiency of the court itself? And if we increase the number beyond what is wanted on the bench, where shall we stop? what is the limit? The honorable chairman admitted that soon another must be added to the number; but contended that ten would answer the exigencies of the country for some hundred years to come. Sir, if we add two now, for the purpose of doing circuit duties, and for that purpose only, what shall we say when, at short intervals of time, two more, and two more, and so on, (until the court comes to consist of twenty or thirty justices,) are demanded at our hands for the like purpose? Shall we say that the duties of the bench require no addition? But if this objection be of no avail now, when we have not passed the safe boundary, of what avail will it be then, when we have passed that boundary? Again, sir, the number of circuits must always depend more upon the extent of territory to be traversed, than upon the quantity of business to be done. Look over the vast territories of the United States! When these come to be divided and admitted into the Union, must they not be provided for? What assurance have we that the States, if we sanction the principle of this bill, will not successively claim the right of having a justice of the Supreme Court? Think you that such claims would or could be rejected? If, then, we pass this bill, and incur these dangers, what security remains for the independence, or soundness, or safety of the Supreme Court.

But, in order to weaken the force of these objections, the honorable gentleman insisted, with much apparent zeal, that there ought to be a judicial representation upon the bench of the Supreme Court! A representative court! And for what purpose? Is it to be of State courts, of State rights, or of State laws? Then ought not each State to have her own separate representative on the bench? Sir, to me this doctrine is alarming. I have hitherto heard it suggested; but this is the first time I remember to have heard it seriously urged. Is it not fallacious, and full of mischief? What is it? Is it not this—that a judge, having acquired at a circuit court all the knowledge he can of the local law, first decides what the law of the particular State is, and then represents his own decision to his brethren on the bench as the law of the State? Will any great good be likely to result from this sort of judicial representation? I think not. But I ask the committee, whether, in a court organized upon these principles, there may not necessarily be another sort of representation? Will not such a court too often and too faithfully represent the prejudices, and passions, and partisan spirit of the day?

I agree with the honorable chairman, that we ought not to resort to independent circuit courts and judges, if a better plan can be devised. Still, I think the circuit court system less objectionable than the plan proposed by the bill; and the plan I have submitted less objectionable than either, because it is simple, cheaper, more efficient, and more uniform. But I cannot agree with him, that the prejudices of the people against the old system of 1801 still exist. Sir, I know nothing of the men, or the motives, or the measures of that day, except from history. I am no advocate of that system; it will not do for the present day; it lived but a year, and I will not open its grave, nor disturb its ashes. By recurring, however, to the history of that stormy period, the committee, I think, will find that that system was abolished, not because it proved to be intrinsically or practically wrong, but because the people thought such a number of judges unnecessary and burdensome. So in the present case. Is not the honorable gentleman in danger of falling into the same difficulty? Is not his plan obnoxious to the same objections? Are nine justices of the Supreme Court necessary? They are not for the security of the constitutions, or laws, or liberty of the country. As their numbers are increased, their individual responsibility will be less felt, and their high powers will be exercised with less and less consideration and care. Nor are nine necessary for the prompt and discreet administration of justice. But all the purposes of justice will be readily and equally attained by adopting the plan which the amendment proposes. Should experience prove that intermediate courts are convenient and desirable, they may be easily formed of the district court judges, without at all disturbing the harmony or uniformity of the system. There are now twenty-seven district judges, and thirty-two or three districts. Courts may be organized, composed of three of these judges. Take New York and New Jersey, for example. They are divided into three districts, and have three judges. It is so also with Pennsylvania and Delaware. In this way, nine courts may be organized, with appellate jurisdiction, or with the jurisdiction which the present circuit courts possess, with the merit of embracing all the States, and of producing entire equality among all, without the appointment of a single new judge.

Against the separation of the justices of the Supreme Court from the circuit courts, the honorable chairman strongly objected, because, in that event, the justices might become idle, rusty, and corrupt. These are not the terms he used; but if I did not mistake the design of his remarks, these were, in his judgment, the probable consequences which might flow from withdrawing the justices from the circuits.

I freely admit that I feel great difficulty on this point. This difficulty, however, does not arise from a conviction of the soundness of the objections; for, on the contrary, I am convinced that they are unsound. But it arises from the strong prejudices, which, I am aware, are entertained by many against separating the two courts—from the fact, that we are quick to perceive present good, and slow to apprehend future evil; and from the known propensity men have, of being thought economical and prudent to-day, at whatever expense to-morrow; and of contenting themselves with partial remedies for growing and inveterate evils; which, being thus tolerated, sometimes end in the destruction of property and liberty and life.

The existing prejudices upon this subject cannot be the fruits of experience. This plan, in regard to the Supreme Court of the United States, has never been fairly tried. And the experience of State courts, in this respect, will be found to have little application to the case before us. I readily admit that the justices of the Supreme Court will derive some advantages from attending the circuits. But I cannot admit that those advantages, be they what they may, will countervail the evils of increasing the number of justices on the bench, or that they will be such as the honorable gentleman supposed. It is true, that riding the circuits will keep them from idleness. So will traveling for any other purpose. So the time thus employed, if applied in examining the laws of the country, will not only keep them from growing idle and rusty, but will make them abler lawyers and better judges.

The same advantages, moreover, will result from attending the different terms of the Supreme Court, if my amendment be adopted. But they are to learn the laws and practice of the States, by holding the circuit courts! How is this to be done? Is it by traversing the States in stage coaches or steamboats? Or is this knowledge to be acquired from the contradictions of lawyers during the trial of a cause? To what extent? Is the circuit judge to attain a profound knowledge of all the laws, customs, and practice of the States in which he holds, and while he is holding his court? This will not be pretended. It appears to me, therefore, that, to sustain this argument, it must be shown that the knowledge of the law or the practice thus acquired at the circuits, be it much or little, cannot be obtained in any other way, and that, without it, the Supreme Court cannot come to a just decision upon causes brought up from the circuit courts. The honorable gentleman, in support of his argument, referred to the Supreme Court of England, and seemed to conclude that, as the justices of that court were benefited by performing nisi prius duties, so ours would be alike benefited by performing circuit court duties. Sir, to judge of this matter rightly, we must attend to the facts in the two cases. What are they? The Supreme Court of England has no jurisdiction of equity or of admiralty causes. The Supreme Court of the United States has jurisdiction of matters at law and in equity, and of admiralty and maritime causes. In England, there is but one constitution of Government. In the United States, there are twenty-five distinct constitutions of Government. There, one code of statute law prevails. Here, there are twenty-five different codes of statute law. There, we find, with trifling exceptions, but one system of common law. Here, we find twenty-four systems of the common law, each varying from the other. There, the rules of practice and the law of evidence are the same in all her courts of nisi prius. Here, the rules of practice and the law of evidence are different in every circuit court in the Union. What next? Why, the justices of the Supreme Court of England, when in consultation, compare the knowledge which each has acquired, of the same constitution and laws and practice, and by which each has been always and every where governed. But when the justices of our Supreme Court are in consultation, is it so with them? It is not—because the local constitutions and laws and practice are not the same in any two of their circuits. Now, according to the argument, the justice allotted to one circuit is supposed to rely upon his brother justice for information as to what the law, or the practice, in each particular case, is in another circuit. But, if each justice possesses a thorough knowledge of the whole law of the case, then such information will not be sought or required, and the decision of the case will be the judgment of the court. Whereas, if this sort of information be material and necessary, then the decision of the case is no longer the judgment of the court, but of a single member of the court.

But permit me to give another view of the matter. Take this new court of nine, as it is proposed to be organized. After it has been in operation a sufficient length of time, suppose the justices to be assembled in consultation. Nine causes, one from each circuit, are before them for examination and decision. The cause from the ninth circuit (of which Louisiana is a part) is taken up, and is to be decided according to the civil law of Louisiana. Now, if the whole nine have acquired a full knowledge of so much of the civil law as is applicable to the cause, then it cannot be necessary for one of the number to go into that circuit to acquire and impart to his brethren on the bench a knowledge of the law which they already possess. If, however, they do not possess this knowledge, but eight of them are obliged to rely upon the ninth for information respecting any portion of the law or the practice material to a correct decision of the cause, then it is plain that the judgment in the cause is that of a single judge, and not the judgment of an intelligent court. The same may be said respecting each circuit. And is this among the advantages contended for? Sir, it seems to me that the argument, which proves that the plan proposed by the bill may be a very good one for a State, is a strong argument to prove that it is a very bad one for the United States. And will not increasing the justices of the Supreme Court rather aggravate than lessen the mischief? I do not mean to intimate that the learned justices of that high tribunal do not understand fully the law applicable to every case that comes before them. Far be it from me to impute such wrong to them. But it is said, that, if they are detached from their circuit duties, they will not have the means of obtaining all the necessary books of law and practice, from which to acquire a competent knowledge of the laws of the several States. Then let Congress furnish a library at each place where a term of the court is to be holden—for it cannot be more necessary for the United States to provide courts, than to provide able judges. And if the necessary knowledge be beyond the reach of individual means, the Government should furnish the means, that the laws may be executed, and justice be done.

The honorable chairman apprehended that the justices, if withdrawn from the circuits, would probably come to the city of Washington to reside, where they might possibly, in future time, become corrupt. Sir, if I thought the political influences of the day would act more strongly upon them, than upon other men here, I should agree with him. But is there danger that corruption will insinuate its way into the bosom of the court? If so, where is it most likely to effect its purpose? Is it here, when the eye of the nation is continually upon them, and where the concurrence of three or four, at least, is necessary to decide a cause; or at the circuits, where they may be taken in detail, one by one, and where, too, both the property and the life of the citizen may depend upon the decision of a single circuit judge?

I very much regretted one remark which fell from the honorable gentleman. I was sorry to hear him invoke, in advance, the public indignation upon the court, by characterizing it as fulminating its decrees from a dark and vaulted chamber, declaring State laws unconstitutional. Wherefore utter a doubt as to the exercise of powers which are clearly constitutional? Wherefore seem to impugn the members of a court justly distinguished, as well for their learning and integrity, as for their republican meekness and simplicity? And wherefore cast the dark shades of suspicion over this high tribunal? It is the only strong barrier between armed power and the unarmed citizen. It should be cautiously touched. Sir, much handling soils the whiteness of the ermine, as it dims the lustre of fine gold. And though it do not destroy, it deeply injures.

The honorable gentleman gives me to understand that he did not deny this high power to the court, of deciding upon the constitutionality of laws. I know, sir, he did not. But his language implied that the exercise of it was odious. It is of that I complain. What is doubted, soon comes to be denied. Is not this great power indispensable to our safety? And if so, ought it to be impaired? Suppose Congress should suspend the writ of habeas corpus, when there was no war, nor insurrection, nor rebellion—in a time of profound peace, and when every man would admit the suspension to be unconstitutional? An innocent citizen is arbitrarily seized and imprisoned; what redress has he? Will he come to Congress for it? Congress is his oppressor. Where then must he go? He must go to this same "dark and vaulted chamber." There is no other power that can open his prison doors and set him free. Again—suppose a State Legislature should revive the old law of attainder, or make bank bills, for example, a legal tender, instead of "gold or silver?" Where else than to this court can the citizen go, for the protection of his property and his blood? But if the war be carried further, as it might be, and a State Government should wantonly attain federal officers—and the Federal Government should arbitrarily imprison State officers, who could stay the strife, and redress the wrong, but the Supreme Court? It is the constitutional judge, and there is none else. The court may sometimes err. But what then? Shall we destroy all respect for it, by direct or implied charges of usurpation? Sir, it appears to me that the fear which leads some to think that the court may wantonly abuse or usurp power, rests upon no good foundation. The justices are liable to impeachment. If they wantonly abuse their high trust, they may be impeached, and turned out of office. This is a strong security. But there is still a stronger. Congress can at any time diminish, or wholly take away, their appellate jurisdiction; and thus leave them nearly powerless. Suppose, however, that we had not this security. Will adding to their number increase their responsibility, or diminish their power, or prevent error in judgment? Directly the contrary.

Should my amendment be adopted, the permanent residence of the justices of the Supreme Court at the city of Washington would not be a thing of course. There would be no necessity for it. But suppose they should come to this city to reside, could they not acquire as much valuable information from the lawyers, and judges, and other citizens, who resort to this place, from the several States, as they could obtain while on their circuits? Besides, if it requires any eye to watch over them, would they not be subjected here to the severe scrutiny of the President, the Senate, and the immediate representatives of the people? If, however, the residence of the justices at Washington be objectionable, it affords an additional reason for having two or three terms a year of the Supreme Court, instead of one. If one term of the court be held at the city of Washington, and one or two other terms be held at one or two of the following places, namely, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, or New York, some of the advantages would be obvious. It would remove the objection, if there be any thing in it, against the justices residing at any one place. They would naturally reside at different places about the country, as they now do. It would prevent delay, and make justice more prompt, by the frequency of the terms. It would be a great accommodation to suitors, by the great saving of time and expense to them. It would carry the court home to the people, and among the people. Sir, I agree that judges, to be good judges, should be employed, and constantly employed. But it is the employment of the mind that makes the judge. It is the time spent in the study, in the acquisition of legal science, and not in stages, in traversing the country, that makes the profound jurist. I have not been able to ascertain the quantity of business the court now has to do. The honorable gentleman seemed to think it might all be done in six weeks or two months. This appears to me to be too low an estimate. But, whatever the fact may be, it is very easy to give the court enough to do. By simply extending the right of appeal, there would soon be enough for the court to do.

There is another evil, of no small magnitude, growing out of this circuit court system; and which the plan proposed by the bill will, in my judgment, go very far to perpetuate. The law requires the judge of the seventh circuit to reside within that circuit. The practice is, in filling a vacancy upon the bench of the Supreme Court, to make the selection within the particular circuit in which the vacancy happened. Pass this bill, and the law and the practice will soon come to be, that each justice must reside within the circuit allotted to him; and when he dies or resigns, some one must be selected within the same circuit, and not elsewhere, to supply his place. Does any one doubt that none but the ablest and fittest men and best jurists should be put upon the bench of the Supreme Court? And ought not the whole field to be left open for the selection of such men? Will not this system often prescribe the fittest men for that high trust? Does it not make the chances of getting the fittest men as one to the whole number of circuits? Thus its practical effect will be to limit the discretion, and control the constitutional power of the Executive. It may do more. Sir, suppose, hereafter, great questions should arise, deeply affecting the property and industry of the country. Suppose one of these questions should respect the constitutional powers of the Federal Government to protect this property and industry. Opposite opinions will be entertained by the people among the different circuits. Some of the circuits will be for the power—others against it. If need be, the circuits may be multiplied. Parties will arise. If one judge can be secured here, and another there, a majority of the court may be procured, who will deny or affirm the power, according to the prevalence of their local feelings. To this end may not partisan influence and power be exerted? And will not the court be moulded of bad materials, and for sinister purposes? And may not it become a great political regency? What, then, are the real benefits which this system of a political court will produce, compared with its real evils? Are they not as the gentle breeze to the fierce tempest that uproots the forest, and prostrates men and temples in its progress? There is no safety in this troubled sea. Why then urge this young, and healthful, and vigorous republic to plunge into the angry flood, and vainly buffet the surge? Is it that she may founder and perish upon the breakers?

Sir, if the people want what is simple, cheap, and uniform, the amendment which I have offered gives a simple, and cheap, and uniform system for the administration of justice throughout the Union. I have before referred to the five large districts which are not embraced by the bill. These are told to be content with their district courts. And yet, sir, the northern district of New York contains nearly one million of inhabitants; and I suppose the other four districts as many more. Thus it will be found that the five districts which are left without the benefits, real or imaginary, of circuit courts, contain as great a population as that portion of the six new States to which the bill extends the circuit court system. My amendment does no such injustice. It puts all upon the same footing.

The members of the Supreme Court should not be too few for the requisite efficiency and weight of character, nor too many for convenience and promptness in the despatch of business. Perhaps the court is now too large. In my opinion it is not. Five would inspire less confidence, and more than seven probably still less. I have always looked, and still look, to this court as the guardian of the oppressed, as the bulwark of freedom. I can do nothing which, in my judgment, will impair its independence or stability, its virtue or intelligence. When and in what country was the law triumphant, or liberty or life safe, where there was not an intelligent, sound, independent judiciary? The Old World furnishes but few examples. England furnishes some, both for evil and for good. Her star chamber court was the offspring of oppression, and soon degenerated into a regency of tyrants. The days of Jefferies exhibit, in strong colors, the bloodshed and ruin which flow from a dependant, servile court. Not so the days of Coke. Then the sword and sceptre were forced to yield to an intelligent, sound, independent judiciary, and the innocent and oppressed were protected. But there is an example nearer home. The old supreme court of New York existed at a time when party spirit ran high, was most embittered and unrelenting, dividing neighborhoods and families. It was composed of men equal to the perils of the hour. It interposed its shield between martial and municipal law, and rescued and saved the citizen. The angry passions of the time have subsided. The value of such a court, in a time like this, is readily appreciated; and the memory of the distinguished men composing it will be revered as long as the science of law or the principles of civil liberty shall have an advocate.

My conviction is thorough, that the justices of the Supreme Court ought to be withdrawn from the circuits. I see no other way to maintain the integrity of the court, which I deem not more essential to its safety than to its usefulness. Think of it as we may, still this high tribunal occupies the neutral ground between the twenty-five governments and the people. No matter whether the oppression or the wrong proceed from the federal or from a State government. Uncontrolled power is the enemy of liberty, and the people's tyrant. It is, therefore, between the governments and the governed, between the powers and duties of the people's agents, and the rights and privileges of the people themselves, that this court is the constitutional judge, and the sole judge. And he assumes a fearful responsibility who impairs this last and strongest citadel, to which man can flee for the protection of liberty or life.

Mr. POLK next rose. He said that, in considering the bill now before the committee, and the amendment offered as a substitute for it by the gentleman from New York, who had just resumed his seat, he perfectly agreed both with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and with the gentleman from New York, that, whatever the judicial system of the United States be, it should be uniform; that the inferior judicial tribunals, however organized, and with whatever jurisdiction and powers it was deemed wise to invest them, as well as the mode of administering justice, should be the same in every portion of the Union. If [said Mr. P.] "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," and if the States are entitled to be governed (as far as this Government can legitimately extend its authority) by equal and uniform laws, operating alike upon every portion of the country, it is difficult to perceive upon what principle it is that the judicial system extended to one portion of the Union should be withheld from another. All the States are equal in point of dignity and of rights. The principles of this bill I prefer to the amendment, though I am not entirely satisfied with either. The bill proposes no new system, but an extension of the old one, long enjoyed by the Atlantic States, to the Western country. I could have wished that its provisions had not only extended the system, but have made it the same in all the States. The West asks this; and is her request unreasonable? In the Atlantic States there is no complaint. There should be none in the nine Western States. Your judiciary ought to expand itself with the growth and population of the country. The system which has been tested by the experience of forty years in the Atlantic States, and which was adapted to our condition in our infancy, has not been enlarged so as to suit us in our manhood. We have outgrown the garment that then fitted us, and it is now too small. Six of the Western States are wholly without the benefit of the present circuit court system, (having only district courts,) and it has been but imperfectly extended to the seventh circuit, composed of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, as I shall presently endeavor to show.

In order to show more distinctly the inequality of the present system as regards the Western States, compared with those east of the Alleghany mountains, it may be well to look, for a moment, to the judicial history of the United States, and to ask of gentlemen here representing the East, why this inequality should have been permitted so long to remain, and what sensible reason there can be now to refuse the remedy.

When the judiciary act of September, 1789, was passed, there were but ten States in the Union: North Carolina, Rhode Island, and Vermont came into the Union subsequently to the passing of that act; and the system which it provided was extended to the former in June, 1790, and to the latter in March, 1791. At the date of that act, with only ten States in the Union, and with a population not exceeding one-third of the present population of the twenty-four States, it was deemed necessary to appoint six judges of the Supreme Court. The States were divided into three circuits, the Eastern, Middle, and Southern. North Carolina was attached to the Southern, and Rhode Island and Vermont to the Eastern circuits, as they respectively came into the Union. Two judges of the Supreme Court were required to preside in each circuit with the respective district judges, and constituted the circuit court, until the act of March, 1793, when one judge of the Supreme Court and the district judge composed the circuit court, who were required to alternate or interchange circuits with each other. It is not my purpose to detain the committee by a minute account of the judicial history, further than to show the inequality of the system as it operates in the different States. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in his opening argument, has relieved me from the necessity of doing so. Thus the system continued until the famous act of the 13th February, 1801, familiarly known to the country as the midnight system. By that act, the Supreme Court judges were relieved from circuit court duties, and were to constitute an appellate court alone. Many additional circuit judges were created and commissioned, two of whom, with the district judge, constituted a court termed a circuit court. This system is not precisely the same with that proposed by the gentleman from New York, but differs from it only in this, that the gentleman's amendment does not propose the appointment of circuit judges, but to invest the district judges with circuit court powers. At the first session of Congress after Mr. Jefferson came into office, the system of 1801 was repealed, and the new judges legislated out of office; and, at the same session, the former system was reorganized, with slight and immaterial alterations from that of 1793, not important here to mention, and the system which we now have was established. At the re-organization of the system in 1802, Kentucky and Tennessee see had been admitted into the Union. Ohio came in shortly afterwards. They were left with only district courts—being at that time unimportant districts, with a sparse and comparatively small population, with but little judicial business to transact, falling within the jurisdiction conferred upon the federal courts. In 1807, they had grown in numbers, in business, and importance, to such an extent, that a law was passed constituting them into a circuit, and appointing a seventh judge of the Supreme Court, who was allotted to that circuit; and who, with the respective district judges in those three States, constitute circuit courts. Louisiana was admitted into the Union in 1812, Indiana in 1816, Mississippi in 1817, Illinois in 1818, Alabama in 1819, Maine in 1820, and Missouri in 1821. The circuit court system was extended to Maine at the same session of Congress that she was admitted into the Union as a free and independent State. The other six States, although admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, have, to this hour, only district courts. No judge from that quarter of the Union has a place upon the bench of the Supreme Court. No judge of the Supreme Court ever aids the district judge in the trial of causes in that quarter of the Union. The constitution, the treaties, and laws of the United States, the constitution and laws of the States, which may be drawn in question in this court, affecting these junior members of the confederacy, in common with the older States, are now expounded by a court of the last resort, composed of six judges east of the Alleghany, and but one west of it, and that one having no connexion with these six States. They have no participation, direct or indirect, in this high tribunal, in protecting or defending the lives, the liberties, or the property of their citizens. Sir, the population of these six Western States is already great, and is rapidly increasing. It is already near two millions of inhabitants. More than twenty-two years have elapsed since the system was extended, imperfectly as it is, to the seventh circuit. Within that period the thick forests of the valley of the Mississippi have been filled by your enterprising and adventurous citizens; and the vast region, then an uninhabited waste, but recently reclaimed from its savage possessors, now swarms with a dense, a free, and a happy population of civilized freemen. The judicial business has increased to such an extent, that they feel the inconvenience of their exclusion from the benefits of the circuit court system, and they clamor for its extension. So great has the judicial business become, that you have already found it necessary, in two of these States, (Louisiana and Alabama,) to establish two district courts in each of them. And let me say, sir, that the district courts at New Orleans and Mobile—whether regarded from the quantity of business which they do, or from the great importance of the legal questions which it often becomes their duty to decide—are second in importance to but few courts in the Union. Are these new States, let me ask, always to remain in their present condition—as judicial provinces? If they are not, has not the time come to extend to them the benefits of the system which you enjoy east of the Alleghany ridge?

I come now to speak more particularly of the seventh circuit, of the inadequacy of the system as at present extended there, and of the utter inability, the physical as well as mental inability, of any one man to perform, as he should, the various duties that devolve upon him in that extensive circuit. In addition to the large territorial extent of that circuit, and the great distance of travel which the judge has annually to perform, in attending the courts at Columbus, at Frankfort, at Nashville, at Knoxville, and the Supreme Court in this city, and in addition to the cases within the jurisdiction of that court, common to all the States, there is a very large mass of litigation there, in regard to land titles, which is scarcely known in the Eastern States. The land litigation in that circuit, over which this court has concurrent jurisdiction with the State courts, is more extensive, and the cases more numerous than in all the Eastern States together. Many of the lands in Tennessee were patented by the State of North Carolina more than forty years ago, when the territory belonged to that State, and when the lands were subject to the Indian possession; and many of the lands have been patented by Tennessee since she has been a member of the Union. It is a fact that cannot be controverted, and need not be concealed, that such is the intricacy and complexity of the land laws of North Carolina and Tennessee, constituting almost a volume of themselves, and certainly forming a distinct code different from any other I have ever seen, that but few men of the profession of law in that State, with years of study and constant practice in the courts, have ever acquired the reputation of being sound land lawyers. Such was the peculiar system of acquiring titles to lands, and such the looseness and uncertainty which prevailed in practice, both in North Carolina, and afterwards practised upon in Tennessee, that one of the greatest scourges that has ever visited the people of that State is the uncertainty of their land titles, and the vast amount of litigation that has grown out of this state of things. Much the greater portion of this description of litigation, I hope, indeed I know, has been disposed of; but, at the same time, much, I fear, yet remains to be settled. This description of litigation, added to the other business, over which the court has jurisdiction, is one great cause of the great delay of justice in the federal court at Nashville. The chairman of the committee has already stated the fact, as represented by the bar of that place, to this House, several years ago, that such was the delay of justice in that court, that some of the causes on the docket were older than the professional career of almost every member of that bar, some of whom had been in practice a dozen and more years. In Kentucky and Ohio, but more especially in the former, much litigation of the same character has existed. Kentucky, when a part of Virginia, was, in great part, patented by that State; and many of the lands in some portions of Ohio were patented by Virginia and other States. The Representatives from both these States inform us, that the courts there have not the time nor the ability to dispose of the causes upon their respective dockets. If this be the fact, and it cannot be controverted, of what consequence is it, that, upon your statute books, you extend the circuit court system to those three States; but so overburden the judge that is allotted to that circuit, that he has neither the merits nor the physical ability to do the business? When those three States were constituted into a circuit in 1807, their population did not exceed half a million of souls. It amounts now to more than two millions. Then the litigation was comparatively small; now it is great.

I have thus attempted to present to the committee the true present condition of the nine Western and Southwestern States, in reference to the operation of the federal judiciary within their limits. That condition presents many evils and inconveniences that require a remedy. What that remedy should be, it will be proper that I should next consider.

And first, will this bill afford the remedy which the existing evils require? It will unquestionably in part, and but in part, remedy some of the existing inconveniences of the present organization of the courts; but I regard it as a misfortune that the Judiciary Committee who reported it had not gone further, and afforded a complete remedy. Three additional judges, instead of two, would have enabled us so to arrange the circuits as to extend equal justice to the West, and to afford a system that will require no alteration or extension in all time. This bill makes no provision for the western district of Louisiana, or the northern district of Alabama. The courts at Opelousas and at Huntsville are still to be left with only district courts. The four States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and

Missouri, are crowded into one circuit; Kentucky and Tennessee are united in one circuit; and the southern district of Alabama, Mississippi, and the eastern district of Louisiana are thrown in one circuit. Sir, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has stated that Tennessee and Kentucky must be united in one circuit, however reluctant the Union may be. That, he says, is the only arrangement by which nine judges can be made to answer for the present. That gentleman, when this subject was last before Congress, in 1826, voted with a large majority of this House to separate Kentucky and Tennessee, and throw them into different circuits, because of the undue proportion of judicial business in those two States; that gentleman, at that time, voted for ten judges instead of nine. He then thought less than ten judges would not do. If it was then proper to separate Tennessee and Kentucky, what has since occurred to render it so peculiarly necessary to unite them now? If the state of the Western country was in such a condition then, that, in the opinion of the gentleman, ten judges were required to do the business, what has since occurred to change that opinion? Has not the Western country been advancing rather than receding in population, since that time? Has the judicial business decreased, or, rather, has not the gentleman himself labored to prove to us that it has increased since that time? At that time, I believe, it was admitted by all who advocated the extension of that system, that less than ten judges would not afford a remedy for the evils of which the West complained. The then chairman of the Judiciary Committee in this House, (now a Senator from Massachusetts,) in reporting the bill with ten judges, I well remember, stated that he rather assented to ten judges, than recommended their appointment at that time. He rather inclined to prefer nine to ten judges, but ultimately voted for ten. I see gentlemen around me, noting this. They will be pleased to note, too, the ground upon which that opinion was expressed by the then chairman of the Judiciary Committee. It was that, in his opinion, the three Northwestern States (Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri) "might well enough go on for some time longer, and form a circuit of themselves, perhaps, hereafter, as the population shall increase, and the state of affairs require it."

This was the only plan by which the then chairman of the committee thought it practicable to make two additional justices of the Supreme Court answer the demands—the just demands of the West. It was to leave Missouri, Indiana, and Illinois, with only district courts for the time being, and constitute them into a circuit at some future period. The bill in 1826, after a protracted discussion of many weeks, passed this House, adding three additional judges to the Supreme Court, making the whole number ten. The same bill passed the Senate with the same number of judges, but was amended in that body so as to change the two northwestern circuits in their arrangement. The bill, as it passed this House, placed Ohio and Kentucky in the seventh circuit, in which there was already a judge residing, and constituted Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri into a separate circuit. The Senate passed the bill without alteration in its material parts; but proposed to change those two circuits, so as to make Kentucky and Missouri the seventh circuit, and to constitute Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois into a circuit. The bill, as it passed both in the Senate and in the House, placed Tennessee and Alabama in one circuit, and Mississippi and Louisiana in another. In consequence of this immaterial difference of opinion between the two Houses in the arrangement of the two northwestern circuits, the bill unfortunately failed between the two Houses. Although the two Houses then agreed in opinion that it was proper to extend the system, and to add three additional judges to the bench of the Supreme Court, yet, in consequence of this unimportant difference of opinion about these two districts, the Western country remains to this hour without the enjoyment of the system which that bill proposed to extend to her. Let, then, additional judges be appointed in the West, and let the circuits be properly arranged, and the system will last for all time. When Florida, Arkansas, and Michigan come into the Union, (and the period is not very distant when we may expect their accession to the Union,) they can be very naturally attached to the adjacent circuits, without much increasing the duties of the judges. To make the system entirely uniform, I would attach the northern district of New York, the western district of Pennsylvania, and the western district of Virginia, if the gentlemen from those quarters of the Union desire it, to the respective circuits already established east of the Alleghany, which they adjoin. Your system would then possess no anomalies, it would have symmetry in all its parts. If the amendment of the gentleman from New York should be rejected, and no other gentleman does, I will, myself, propose an amendment to make the system such as I have indicated. If the House shall decide to appoint only two additional judges, then justice will require that the eastern circuits should be enlarged, so as to give the services of one, at least, of the judges now east of the mountains to the West.

Gentlemen representing the East can best determine whether they can without inconvenience enlarge their circuits, so as to transfer to the West one of their judges. If this enlargement can be made, and the business of the East can be done with one judge less than they now have, then the location of the judges of the third circuit—his residence at Pittsburg, in western Pennsylvania, is favorable to this transfer to a western circuit. The third circuit is now composed of Pennsylvania and New Jersey; and the fourth circuit of Maryland and Delaware. If gentlemen are unwilling to give us their established judges, and retain their circuits in the East, as at present arranged, then I submit to them, whether the third and fourth circuits may not be consolidated into one, by attaching a part of the one or the other either to the New York or the Virginia circuits, so as not too much to increase the duties of the judges of these circuits. If this can be done, so as to give four judges to the West, then the wants of the West will be supplied, and the Supreme Court will consist of nine judges. This is the only plan by which, as I conceive, a less number than ten can be made to answer.

I come next to consider the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, as a substitute for this bill. I have already said that the system, whatever it be, should be uniform. But that is not all that it should be. It should be equal and just in its operations upon all the States, and it should be efficient; and, for myself, I am free to declare that I would infinitely prefer an extension of the system long established, and sanctioned by experience in the older States, to the untried experiments proposed by this amendment. The plan proposed by the amendment, it is true, would possess uniformity; but, in my opinion, would wholly fail to remedy the evils complained of, and would create others much more dangerous in their tendency than those that already exist. But, before I call the attention of the committee to this amendment, permit me to say a word in reply to a portion of the argument of the gentleman from New York. That gentleman has pathetically informed us that he will not open the tomb of the system of 1801, and disturb its ashes that have been so long interred. The gentleman at the same time told us that that system was not put down because it was wrong, because it was not wise, or because it was not the best system, for [said he] the single year that it lived did not give time to test its advantages by a fair experiment; but it was repealed because of the unnecessary multiplication of the judges; and he intimated that the party fury of the times had much agency in effecting its destruction. Sir, I am as much averse as the gentleman can be, to revive, unnecessarily, unpleasant recollections of events that are past, but I cannot, after the avowal of the gentleman in reference to that system, and in support of his amendment, and especially when I consider that the amendment itself is the same in principle with it, refrain from saying a word or two in regard to it. I should not have felt myself at liberty to do so, but for the laudatory and unexpected strain in which he has been pleased to speak of it. What, sir, was the system of 1801? It was the midnight system of the elder Adams—ushered forth to the world in the last desperate paroxysm of a sinking party, who were premonished by the public voice that they were soon to retire from power; of a party who had lost the public confidence, but who, by means of the majority which they still retained in Congress, seized upon the judiciary as the last remaining fortress in which they hoped to save themselves and perpetuate their principles. The act of 1801 was passed, and it is well remembered, lasted but a single year. It met with a decided reprobation of a majority of the people of the United States; and as it was the last desperate expedient of our administration, to entrench itself in the judiciary, and to secure in that co-ordinate branch of the Government a continuance and (as they hoped) a perpetuity of the principles of that administration, so its repeal was amongst the first acts of the succeeding administrations; and I think I am warranted in saying, that such is the well grounded and settled hostility of the people of this country, and such their prejudices (if gentlemen please to call their opinions by that name) against the system, that they cannot, they will not, and ought not, with composure, to remain silent, and see it resuscitated and revived. It was doubtless believed, when the act of 1801 was passed, that the judges, whose appointment it authorized, could not be constitutionally removed in any other mode than by impeachment; and that, holding their offices for life, they would be beyond the reach of the political party who were shortly to succeed those who enacted it. In this they were mistaken. After Mr. Jefferson came into power, the repeal of the system was resisted, upon constitutional grounds. It was, however, repealed, and, as I have already stated, in noticing the judicial history of the country, the judges were legislated out of office.

What, sir, let me inquire, is the amendment of the gentleman from New York, so far as the Supreme Court, as a mere Supreme Court, is concerned, but a re-enactment of the system of 1801? It proposes to withdraw the judges of the Supreme Court from their circuit duties, and to constitute them a permanent appellate court. So did the act of 1801. It provides that the circuit courts shall be abolished, and that the district courts shall possess the jurisdiction and powers of the present circuit courts. If the amendment offered had gone on to provide for the appointment of two additional judges in each circuit, to hold the courts with the respective district judges, it would have been precisely the system of 1801. This is the only difference. The amendment has only this to recommend it, which that system had not, that it does not increase the number of the inferior judges, and does not enlarge the patronage of the Executive.

When we contemplate the system proposed by the gentleman's amendment, in the most dispassionate manner, there are many and irresistible objections to it. Some of these have already been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; in his general remarks in the opening of this debate. If the judges of the Supreme Court are confined exclusively to their appellate duties in bank, there is danger—in fact, it is almost certain, that they will cease to employ themselves, in the recess of the Supreme Court, in the dry, laborious, and uninteresting employment of reading the statutory codes of twenty-four States, and the judicial decisions of the State courts founded upon these codes, scattered through a hundred volumes, and all of which it is necessary they should understand. No man, with the most unremitted application and study, can be so good a lawyer, no man can be so good a judge of the lex loci, or statute law of a State, who is confined to the trial of appeals and writs of error at Washington, as one who presides on the trial of the cause in the inferior court, where the law, and the decisions of the State in which it prevails, are familiar to the profession of that State, who elucidate and apply it in argument in the court below. The great advantage derived from the present circuit system is, that, by requiring each judge of the Supreme Court to preside with the district judge in the trial of causes in the inferior courts, you make him familiar with the statute or local law within his circuit. And when the Supreme Court assembles in bank to try appeals and writs of error, some one of the judges is always familiar with the law upon which the decision of the case may depend, and by this knowledge is enabled to abridge the labor of his associates, and afford them facilities in examining the case, and in arriving at a just conclusion. What judge permanently located at Washington, however vigorous his intellect, and however profound his knowledge of the fundamental principles of the law may be, but who never presided over the trial of an ejectment in Kentucky or Tennessee, if left to grope his way unaided by the argument of counsel from that quarter of the Union, can ever understand or properly expound the intricate local laws of these States? What judge can understand the lex loci of Louisiana, where the principles of the civil law obtain? In a word, what one man, wholly relieved from the trial of causes in the court below, can or will ever understand the separate and distinct codes of these twenty-four States? Even by the present circuit court system, in those States to which it has been extended, no single judge has an accurate knowledge of the statutory codes of all these States; but when assembled in the Supreme Court, they bring together an aggregate of legal information, which no one singly possesses, and which could not be possessed by any, if they were withdrawn from their circuits. If the judges of the Supreme Court are required to preside only in the Supreme Court, they will have nine or ten months of leisure in the year, which they can, and probably will, employ in more pleasing pursuits than in poring over musty volumes of statutes. It has been often justly remarked that constant employment on the bench, and being constantly thrown in collision with the profession, makes the best judge; or, as it has been aptly expressed, "the judge who tries the most causes is the best judge." The gentleman from New York thinks that there is not much in the argument, that the judges upon the circuit can acquire legal information that will be useful to the Supreme Court assembled in bank; and he puts a case. Suppose, says he, the court to consist of nine judges, and each to perform circuit duties. One of these judges presides on the trial of a cause at New Orleans, and there is a writ of error to the Supreme Court; one judge will understand the municipal law of Louisiana upon which the case depends; the remaining eight do not, but must investigate it for themselves. The case put by the gentleman illustrates and enforces the argument which I have stated. Suppose the ninth judge had not presided on the trial at New Orleans—then the whole court would have been without the necessary legal information. Did it not occur to the gentleman in the case stated by him, that it was better for one to possess the information, than that none should? Did it not occur to him that the judge who had the information might afford facilities to his associates, by pointing them to the authorities which would throw light upon the questions to be decided?

The gentleman from New York has urged that the judges of the Supreme Court should not be sent upon the circuits, because, he says, the circuit court duties are merely incidental, and not such as the judges of this high court should be required to perform. Whether the duties upon the circuits be incidental or principal, I shall not undertake to decide; but whether they be the one or the other, they are just such as the judges of this court have been required to perform ever since the organization of the judiciary in 1789, until this time, with the single exception of the year during which the act of 1801 was in force. By withdrawing the judges of this court from the view of the people, and constituting them a corporation of dignitaries at the seat of Government, clothed in the robes of office, with immense power, holding their offices for life, with no direct responsibility to the people, and only liable to punishment for gross crimes and misdemeanors, there is danger that public confidence in their integrity may be weakened—that they may become odious, and their decisions cease to be regarded with that respect and submission which it is desirable they should be. Of the increased danger of corruption, if they were permanently located here, constantly subject to be operated on by the federal influence concentrated here, and constantly inhaling the vapors of this district, I can add nothing to what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But I will say, that the tendency of this court to enlarge, by construction, the powers of the Federal Government at the expense of the State sovereignties, is already sufficiently strong; and I fear, if they were permanently located here, that tendency would be increased. It is the nature of man to have power, and he seldom fails to exercise it when he can. I have as much respect for this court as I ought to have, and no more. They are but men. I will not repeat the language used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which seemed to be so offensive to the ear of the gentleman from New York, that there is danger, if you withdraw these judges from the circuits, that the time may come, when, feeling power and forgetting right, “they may fulminate their decrees from the dark and vaulted chamber which they occupy in this capitol,” wholly concealed from the public view; but I will say, that the system which has the sanction of long experience, ought not to be exchanged for one, the tendency of which may be to render this court obnoxious, and, if corrupted, possibly dangerous to the constitution. There is another objection to the system proposed by this amendment, which I will briefly state before I take leave of it. It proposes to invest the present district judges, and all who may hereafter be appointed district judges, with the powers and jurisdiction at present possessed by the circuit courts. Causes of great magnitude are to be tried by these single judges, and their decision in civil cases, under a given amount, is final and conclusive. They will have jurisdiction over criminal offences against the United States affecting the life and liberty of the citizen. The salary of the district judges is small; and I mean no disparagement to those now in office, when I say, that, as a general rule, gentlemen of the first legal attainments have not been willing to accept of the office for the compensation afforded; and yet this proposition is to give to them, in many cases, final and conclusive jurisdiction. Will this satisfy the country so well as if a judge of the Supreme Court, eminent for his talents and distinguished for his legal acquirements, were required to preside in the circuit courts with them? I think it will not and should not. Whatever, therefore, may be the fate of the bill, I trust that this amendment may be rejected.

The great objection urged against the extension of the present system to all the States, has heretofore been, the increase of the number of the judges of the Supreme Court. It has been repeatedly said, that nine or ten judges will make the court too numerous for the convenient despatch of business, that it will become a political body, and that there is danger that factions and party politics may make their way into this court. All these have been again repeated by the gentleman from New York; but it seems to me, when they are properly examined, they will be found to be rather ideal than not. The gentleman from New York, to whose remarks I have had occasion so often to refer, has told me that seven are enough—that nine or ten are too many; that, if we advance beyond the present number, we are travelling upon untrodden ground; that there is no limit; and he asks, where are we to stop, and may we not appoint twenty or a hundred, and would not this be too many? Sir, the answer is, appoint the number required by the exigencies of the country, and no more. Ten will be sufficient to do the business in his day or mine. The extreme cases put by him can never occur, and require no answer. I have never discovered what magic there was in the number seven, or what peculiar adaptation there was in that number for this court over any other convenient number. I agree with the gentleman, that this court should not be a political court. A judge should not be a politician, I mean a partisan. I would not deprive him of the rights of a citizen. But has the gentleman shown that the increase of the number from seven to ten would produce that consequence? He has not. Then the argument has nothing in it. If the gentleman will take a short retrospect of the present court, which he wishes so much to preserve with its present number, that it may not be distracted by political factions on the bench, he will find that some of the judges of this favorite number of his were found, at no very remote period, mingling in politics, and in party politics. They did not take them on the bench with them. I only mention this to show that, in any view, this argument of the gentleman proves nothing. Some gentlemen seem to have great apprehensions, if this court is increased by the appointment of additional judges from the West, that it will be inoculated with western opinions and western doctrines. And are gentlemen prepared to say that the opinions, the legal opinions, if gentlemen please, and the constitutional doctrines of the West are less authentic, or more unsound, than the opinions of other portions of the Union? No one has said so in terms. No one will say so. Then what is there in this argument but a chimera of the imagination, calculated rather to alarm our fears than to inform our judgments? The gentleman from New York must have exhausted his resources in seeking for objections to this measure of justice, of equal justice, which the West asks. He imagines that he has found a difficulty in procuring proper judges residing in the new circuits, if the number should be increased. He has stated that usage, if not law, requires that the judge should be taken from the circuit to which he is to be allotted; and, when appointed, he must reside there. Sir, this is a matter, if the bill should pass, within the discretion of the Executive. He may select the judge from whatever quarter of the Union he chooses, but, when appointed, he must reside within his circuit. Sir, the gentleman need not be alarmed. His apprehension of difficulty upon this point pays but a poor compliment to the intelligence and legal learning of the new circuits proposed to be established. No one of these circuits is so poor in legal learning, but that some one man may be found residing within it possessing sufficient qualifications (if the President shall think proper to select one in the circuit) to entitle him to a place upon the bench of the Supreme Court. There is one other objection to the extension of the judicial system which we propose, that I will briefly notice before I conclude. It is said that the representative principle should not obtain in this court. I agree that there should not be a representation of factions, political or sectional; but there should be a representation of legal knowledge, of that description of legal knowledge of the local enactments or municipal regulations of the various parts of the Union, which can only be acquired by a judge, by presiding in the circuits where they obtain. To this extent, I maintain that the representative principle should obtain.

I feel, sir, upon this subject, and therefore speak, as a Western man; though sure I am, if it were viewed with the liberal eye of a statesman of enlarged views, it would not be regarded as a sectional measure, but as one deeply affecting the whole Union, and one addressing itself to the magnanimity and justice of the whole Confederacy. I trust, in the consideration we are giving it, it will be so regarded. We do not wish to take from the East any of the advantages which she now enjoys. We do not ask her to give up any thing that she now possesses; but we ask her, not as matter of favor, but of justice and of right, to put us on the same footing—to extend to us the same advantages. The West might appeal to Maine, and say, you are the only one of the younger members of the Union to which this system was promptly extended upon your admission into the Union. We will not deprive you of it, but we ask of you, after such long delay, to extend the same system to us. We say to the East generally, that whether you view the Western country in regard to its territorial extent, its salubrity of climate, its fertility of soil, its present population, or its ultimate destiny, you find the sure presages of a great and a powerful people, whose pride it will ever be to draw still closer the union that binds us to the elder members of the Union. Will you still keep us without the pale of your judicial system? Sir, permit me to say, before I take my seat, that if we can get nothing more, I will vote for this bill. It is not all that we ask, but it is better than what we have. I trust, however, that it may yet be amended so as to do that full justice to the Western States which they have so long asked at your hands without success.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

THURSDAY, JANUARY, 21, 1830.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, on the 14th instant, and laid on the table; which he now modified so as to read as follows:

“Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House with a Register, exhibiting, in each and every year, the names and number of all the cadets that have been received into the Military Academy of the United States from its first establishment until the present time. Also, the names and number of applicants rejected; the States from which they came respectively; distinguishing between those who have graduated and received commissions, and such as have withdrawn, or have been dismissed from the institution; how many have been in said academy, whose fathers and guardians were, or are now, members of Congress, or other officers of the General Government, or Governors of States, and how many such are now there; what the monthly pay of the cadets, and whether they are supplied with rations, fuel, quarters, &c. at the public expense, or are furnished by themselves; stating also, as far as practicable, what proportion of them (if any) were in circumstances too indigent to be educated on their own means, or those of their parents; the names and number of those graduates now in the army of the United States; also, the names and number of the professors, instructors, and all other officers employed in said academy, with their pay and emoluments—adding thereto the entire aggregate expense of the institution, annually, with such remarks as may explain and elucidate the whole.”

Mr. INGERSOLL said, a call for information is one of the last things which he ever permitted himself to oppose. Nor did he rise now so much to interpose an objection to the call, as to refer the honorable mover of the resolution to several reports from the War Department in the library of the House, which will be found to contain nearly all that is sought for by the proposed inquiry. If, after looking into these documents, the gentleman from South Carolina should still wish to urge the passage of his resolution, although he [Mr. I.] might deem it in the main unnecessary, yet he could not say that he should vote against it, so reluctant was he, as a general rule, to put any obstacle in the way of an inquiry, directed to one of the executive departments, that any member should see fit to suggest. This military academy is one of those establishments that has been probably more closely watched than any other within the range of our legislation; and there have been, from time to time, so many searching resolutions sent to the War Department on its account, that there is hardly a spot left which we may wish to touch by a resolution that has not been covered by some previous call. These inquiries, so far as they had fallen within his observation, have been, in every instance, promptly and fully responded to by the department under different administrations; volume after volume of reports are sent to us, printed, bound, and placed upon the shelves of the library, not, sir, it would seem, to be opened by us, for whose benefit, and at whose beck, but not at whose expense, they were placed there, but to be followed by other fresh volumes, embracing the same facts, and sent to every new Congress, in reply to the requisition of some honorable member, to whom, as a matter of course, we extend the courtesy of our votes. This practice, he thought, was going too far. Why repeat these drafts upon the department, when, by looking at our own documents, we can find, ready printed, the very information for which we are looking elsewhere? But, to come to the resolution now before us: it asks for a list of cadets who have belonged to the academy since 1802, noting those who have been commissioned in the army, and those who have left without commissions. Now turn to the volume of documents for 1824, and we shall find a very full and lucid report from the then Secretary of War, (the present Vice President,) bringing the required information up to that period. It gives us the number admitted in each year; the number who have completed the regular course of studies; a list of those who have received commissions, and those who have been dismissed, or permitted to depart, without commissions, from the first establishment of the institution, under President Jefferson, to the then present time. But this is not all, nor a tenth part of what we have drawn from the department in relation to it. In 1822, the House, in answer to one of its resolutions, was furnished with a list of all the cadets who had left the academy without entering the army, and the amount of money paid to each during the five preceding years; also, a list of such officers as have been educated there, and who served during the last war. What more can you reach by this resolution (in regard to these particulars) than you already have, for the time, covered by the reports? Subsequent reports, and the bluebook, which is put into the hands of every Congress, and which will be in a few days upon our tables, bring the information up to the present time. Besides, we had a report at the last session from the gentleman then at the head of the department, [General PENNEN] which gave us the number of cadets commissioned since 1820, designating those now in the army; and his predecessor, [Mr. BARRETT] in the session before, sent us, in answer to a call, a particular statement of the expenses of the institution, from year to year, ever since it was organized. What else do we now ask for? Why, that the Secretary of War would tell us how much the monthly pay of a cadet is. What, sir, after having made a law ourselves establishing the pay, shall we send elsewhere to be informed as to the wages we ourselves allow? Shall we, who are a part of the legislative branch of the Government, send to an executive department to learn the tenor of our own laws? This would be an anomaly in legislation. If you wish for such information, open your statute books, would be a very proper answer of the Secretary to such an inquiry. But, as if to render this part of the call doubly useless, we have been furnished, for nearly fourteen years past, with a minute statement, in the blue book, of the names and number of all connected with the academy, whether as teachers or cadets, the States from whence they come, and an accurate account, in dollars and cents, of the sums paid to each. Other calls and other reports, similar in kind, might be referred to; for there has hardly been a session during the last ten or dozen years, that a paper shot has not been aimed at West Point from this or the other branch of Congress.

But a few words as to another item; the resolution asks for a list of officers now in the army, who were educated at the academy. Precisely this list was furnished but one year ago by the late Secretary, and is with the rest carefully bound in one of the volumes of documents of the last Congress: surely it cannot be necessary to send again to the department to have the names written by one of the clerks, when we have them in print, at the command of every gentleman who wishes to see them.

We now come to those parts of the resolution which propose new topics of inquiry, and to those he had not the slightest objection, if any gentleman wished them—they are as follows: How many of the cadets were in indigent circumstances, extending the inquiry back to 1802? How many have been the sons of members of Congress? Who have been applicants for admission, and have been rejected? As to the first, who of the cadets have been indigent, or what has been the pecuniary condition of their parents? This question might be very difficult for the department to answer. There can be nothing in the department which can show the pecuniary condition of the parents of those who have been educated; nor can the Secretary gather that information for us without establishing an inquisitorial examination in the different States, hardly compatible with the free institutions to which our constituents have been accustomed. Any partial information would be invidious, and more calculated to mislead than to enlighten us. The next inquiry, how many have been sons of members of Congress, might be much easier answered, and he would go heart and hand with the mover of the resolution to ascertain how this had been. But he could not but think that even this was an inquiry that could be more properly answered among ourselves, (for it concerns us and those who have gone before us,) than by sending to the Secretary of War. Our own officers, the clerk of this House, by comparing the rolls of the cadets with the registers of our members, aided by such information as he could obtain here, could soon furnish us with the requisite list, without going after it beyond our own walls. If, however, others preferred having it from an executive department, be it so, he should not complain.

Again, as to the list of candidates who have been rejected, he had not the slightest objection to the call in this particular. But why not carry the principle out to its full extent? why not go at higher game, and, instead of limiting the inquiry to the boys who have tried to get in at West Point, ask also for the list of men who have been unsuccessful applicants for other offices in the civil departments of the Government? Such a document might make a pretty thick book, but it might be useful, and certainly would be more sought after than most of the documents that are spread before us. It was not, however, to these points that he had risen; for had the resolution contained nothing but these inquiries, he should not have uttered a word. But it was the loose practice which has been insensibly growing upon us, of calling for information that we have already in our hands, that he protested against. He could not consent to have document after document, containing no new facts, piled up before us till these bureaux are nearly buried under the wet paper that the messengers put upon them every morning, and the half of which no one thinks of reading. It is time that this practice of the House was reformed, for, with its growth, our contingent expenses have grown also. It is notorious that these expenses have increased, are increasing, and, he thought, ought to be diminished. They are increasing; do you want proof of it? Look at the estimate made by our own officers, and laid upon our tables. They are put for this year at twenty thousand dollars more for this House than has been appropriated hitherto; and those of the Senate are put ten thousand dollars higher than they have heretofore required. This is not the fault of the officers of this House, or the other House, nor of any others out of Congress; the fault is here. It is a sober truth, that, while we are sending forth speeches on the subject of reform, we practice but little of it in these concerns; like the charity of some, it does not begin at home. We point out the rough path to others, but are not found in it ourselves. As one step towards the true path, he would discontinue the practice to which he had adverted, of sending for and printing books of reports on subjects about which our library is already filled with volumes.

Mr. TUCKER expressed his regret that there should be any objection to the resolution. He thought the inquiry should take place; and, if there were no grounds for complaint, it would be a credit to the institution; but if, on the contrary, partiality had been shown in its management, it was time it should be known.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, then addressed the House, and said, it had then become necessary that he should state his reasons for offering the resolution; and, in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut, it was sufficient to say, that any document or report we have ever had in relation to the Military Academy, was quite deficient in details, and altogether silent as regarded several important items of information called for by the resolution. He had examined those documents, [he said] the most ample of which was the report made in 1828, and it was, as he had stated, quite deficient. He thought full and entire information in relation to that very expensive, if not important institution of our country, would have been desirable, not only to the Military Committee, of which he was a member, but to Congress generally, and to the nation. He, therefore, had not been disposed to make a speech in support of a mere call for information. He thought he should be regarded as bestowing a poor compliment on the intelligence and honest intentions of that House, were he to offer reasons or arguments in support of such a proposition; and believing there could be no reasonable objection to the adoption of the resolution, he had been disposed to submit it to the decision of the House without a single comment. He certainly had not [he said] anticipated the opposition to the resolution which it now seemed destined to encounter. Some of the senior members of the House, [he said] to whose examination it had been submitted before it was presented, thought it ought to pass, and would pass, as "a matter of course." Surely [said Mr. B.] it cannot be the policy of this House to suppress information, full and entire information, as to the utility and operation of one of the most expensive establishments of the Government, particularly when it is well known that jealousy and prejudice exists against the institution to a very great extent. Suppressing or limiting the information now called for, would not [he said] lessen the jealousy, or obviate the prejudice of which he had spoken. Many well meaning and well informed men [said Mr. B.] regard this military academy as the hot-bed of a military aristocracy. They view it as a dangerous excrecence of the Government that ought to be cut off. In its original organization, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, it was intended only to educate a few military engineers, to construct, when necessary, military fortifications, &c. But it has been perverted from its original and legitimate object, and changed, by "piecemeal," into what it is at present, and what, originally, would have been regarded as highly inexpedient on account of its expense, and quite unauthorized by the constitution on account of its objects. It is believed, too, that the public utility resulting from it, if any, is far outweighed by its cost; and although it is nominal a military school, open to all, yet it is, in fact, a school only for the great and the wealthy, where none but the sons or favorites of men possessing power or popularity can be entered—most of whom, after being educated at the public expense, retire to private life, while, at the same time, the expenditures of the establishment (as was well known to all) were drawn from the pockets of the poor as well as the rich. He knew it would be said the poor were received into the Military Academy, as well as the opulent. Well, [said Mr. B.] this is one thing among many others that I wish to ascertain by the resolution I have offered. The fact is doubted—or if a few instances can be adduced where poor friendless cadets have been nurtured by the institution, they only weigh as the “dust in the balance” against those of the opposite description; and if not dismissed for incompetency—as it rarely happens that a poor, friendless lad can obtain credit even for a little common sense—they are retained only in a few solitary instances soon merely to “save appearances.”

Mr. B. said further, if the inquiry was permitted to be made to the extent he proposed, he thought it would be found that the patronage, favors, and benefits of the institution were principally bestowed upon those least in need of them; he meant the sons and favorites of the wealthy—men possessing office and authority; who would be educated if the Military Academy had never existed—and who, not being absolutely dependant on arms, or any other profession or business, generally preferred their ease to a continuance in the public service; and, indeed, if they continued in service, we would soon have more officers than men.

Sir, [said Mr. B.] all those objections, and all those doubts and suspicions are entertained by a respectable portion of the community. He, therefore, thought the friends of the institution (if indeed those doubts and suspicions were unfounded) ought to encourage a full and complete inquiry into all those matters. If the operation of the institution had been as beneficial and impartial as its friends seemed to imagine, they had nothing to fear from the inquiry. If [said Mr. B.] they have done well in fixing upon us this extensive establishment, I hope they will not refuse to exhibit its results. “They ought not to keep their candle under a bushel.” If [said he] the institution has operated impartially and for the public good, a development of its merits will make it more popular. If, on the contrary, it is partial and exclusive in its operations—carrying with it some latent danger—and is, at the same time, more expensive than useful, the sooner it can be known the better—and it ought to be known both in and out of the House—it ought to be generally and universally known. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would be adopted. The information it contemplated, was altogether desirable; as a member of the military committee he asked it; as a member of that House he requested it; and as one of the American people he demanded it.

Mr. B. concluded by offering a modification, by adding after the words “members of Congress,” all other officers of the General Government, or Governors of States.

Mr. DORSEY said he hoped the gentleman would accept a verbal amendment which he was about to offer. He professed himself a friend to the institution. He wished to see it flourish—he wished to allay all prejudice against it. It had been his uniform temper and disposition to encourage resolutions for inquiry, and he should not object to it on this occasion. But he could not consent to a resolution which would emblazon to the world the names of juvenile delinquents, who might now be useful members of society and ornaments of their country. He could not agree to harrow up the feelings of fathers and families, by publishing the names of such as may have been expelled or discharged for boyish indiscretions, which the individual guilty of them may now deeply deplore. He asked what earthly good could result from it?

After some further remarks, he proposed to amend the resolution by striking out, 1st, “names and” where they occur the first time; 2d, how many have been in said academy, whose fathers or guardians were, or are now, members of Congress or other officers of the General Government, or Governors of States; 3d, “also, as far as practicable, what proportion of them (if any) were in circumstances too indigent to be educated on their own means, or those of their parents.”

Mr. BLAIR replied, that he would have no objection to any amendment that would make the inquiry more broad, or render the desired information more ample and complete; but the amendment proposed would have the opposite tendency. It would, if adopted, render the resolution almost a nullity, make it quite useless. Indeed, [he said] he should regard the adoption of the proposed amendment as tantamount to a rejection of the resolution itself. The names [he said] were essential for the purpose of showing how the patronage of the institution had been bestowed, and to what class of society its benefits had been confined. For example, [said Mr. B.] suppose that ten cadets, from South Carolina, Maryland, or any other State, have been dismissed from the Military Academy, without their names; how are the people, or how are we, to ascertain to what rank of society they belong? Without their names it would be impossible to determine that point. He disclaimed every thing invidious, or calculated to reflect censure on the members of Congress, or to attach criminality to those who had recommended applicants for admission into the Military Academy. In that respect, [he said] he presumed all, or nearly all, were equally guilty. He himself had, on one occasion, made such a recommendation, and it had been successful. He again repeated, he meant nothing invidious, and was not disposed to wound the feelings of any one, or to hold them up as objects of scorn or derision; and he was sure the report called for by the resolution could not have that effect, in as much as the cause of dismissal was not required. But the names being necessary to show how the patronage of the institution had been bestowed, he hoped they would not be stricken out. It was true [he said] that some small part of the information called for might be found in reports made heretofore; and that the pay, &c. of the cadets was fixed by law. But all this was scattered—little as it was, it was scattered through various documents; and those who might have an opportunity to peruse the report, might not have it in their power to examine the law. But few of the people could ascertain the laws of Congress on any subject; and his object was to have the whole of the information, contemplated by the resolution, in one document, that members might not be under the necessity of hunting through half a dozen offices, and plodding through twice that number of documents, for a few items of information about the Military Academy.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, followed with some remarks on the subject of the resolution; but, before he had concluded, he was reminded that the hour for the consideration of resolutions had nearly expired.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, on the 14th instant, the question being on the amendments moved by Mr. DORSEY, yesterday. The first amendment was rejected; and the question being on the second,

Mr. CROCKETT, of Tennessee, hoped the amendments would not be agreed to. He labored under a considerable responsibility respecting this academy; he himself was opposed to the school; and as it was possibly for the want of knowledge, he wished to have all the information he could get respecting it. His responsibility arose from the views of his State on the subject. The Legislature had proposed to instruct the Senators and requested the Representatives from that State in Congress to oppose the West Point Academy in every shape; and although the instructions did not pass, his own immediate constituents would expect him to promote the fullest inquiry into the management of the institution. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would be adopted as it was originally proposed. If any thing is wrong, we ought to see it; and I [said Mr. C.] would vote against every appropriation for the academy, unless I can get full information of its concerns and management. I wish to know if it has been managed for the benefit of the noble and wealthy of the country, or of the poor and orphan. There was nothing unreasonable in the call proposed by the resolution, and he approved it in its full extent. He concluded by demanding the yeas and nays on its adoption.

Mr. HAYNES demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment; but the House refused them.

The second and third amendments were then successively rejected by large majorities.

Mr. CONDUCT then moved to strike out these words: "the names of those who have withdrawn or have been dismissed from the institution." It might be, and doubtless was the case, [he said] that many had been dismissed, or had withdrawn, in consequence of deficiency in mental ability, or from sickness; and was it right to hold up their names to the public, as suffering disgrace, without having committed any fault? This would be an act of wanton cruelty to the parents and friends of the young men, and of harshness towards themselves, which he hoped the House would not sanction.

Mr. HAYNES did not think any thing would be gained by the amendment, and that every thing ought to be known in relation to the academy and the cadets.

Mr. INGERSOLL supported the amendment, and Mr. BLAIR and Mr. TUCKER opposed it; and it was rejected without a count.

Mr. TEST then proposed, as an amendment, to add the words, "and how many leave the institution annually." This, also, was negatived.

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought this institution had almost lost the original character given to it by its founder, Mr. Jefferson, in 1802, and he wished copies of the Register of the Academy to be furnished for every year from its commencement, that its operations might be traced through to the present time.

This addition was accepted by the mover of the resolution, and the question recurred on the resolution as amended.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, was not opposed [he said] to obtaining any information which might be deemed necessary by any committee or member of the House. He therefore would not object to this resolution, if it were in a form which he could approve. This, however, was not the case; and he pointed out some of its features, which he deemed not only useless, because the information could not be furnished, but invidious and improper if it could be. The resolution requires, for instance, that the Secretary of War report to the House "how many have been in said academy, whose fathers or guardians were members of Congress, and how many such are now there." This is a strange inquisition [said Mr. E.] for this House, even if it could be made with success, which it could not be with any materials in possession of the War Department. Another branch of the resolution requires the Secretary to report, "as far as practicable, what proportion of the cadets (if any) were in circumstances too indigent to be educated on their own means, or those of their parents." In the first place, it would be impossible for the Secretary, from any records in his office, to ascertain the circumstances of those who had sent their sons to the academy; and, secondly, [said Mr. E.] no man, however opulent, could obtain for his son an education elsewhere, such as that institution afforded. He knew something, personally, of the character and extent of the instruction given there, and he did not hesitate to say that no man, whatever his fortune, could obtain for his son the same education at any other institution. The ability of a man, moreover, to give his son an education on his own means depended on many circumstances which Mr. E. particularized; and he argued at some length to show the impracticability of obtaining the information called for, as well as its useless and improper nature, if it could be obtained. He concluded by moving the commitment of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to—91 to 72.

CULTIVATION OF THE SUGAR CANE, &c.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. SPENCER, of New York, from the Committee on Agriculture, on the 13th instant; and the said resolutions were read as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be procured, through the commanders of the public armed vessels, and our ministers and consuls abroad, such varieties of the sugar cane, and other cultivated vegetables, grains, seeds, and shrubs, as may be best adapted to the soil and climate of the United States.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be prepared a well digested manual, containing the best practical information on the cultivation of sugar cane, and the fabrication and refinement of sugar, including the most modern improvements; and to report the same to the next session of Congress."

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, briefly explained the views of the Committee on Agriculture in reporting this resolution; the increasing importance of this culture; and the advantage of having the best species of cane, &c.

Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, without doubting that the proposed measure would advance the interest of the cultivators of sugar, said that he could not for the life of him discover why this article should be thus singled out for the special favor of Congress. It was well known to every gentleman that a great part of the people of this country live, not by the cultivation of sugar, but of corn and various other products of the soil. Why then draw on the treasury to purchase a book in relation to sugar particularly, the expense of which could not be known to any gentleman on this floor? Is the practical agriculturist—the honest farmer of the country, [Mr. C. asked] thus favored? No, sir, he is not: his walk in life is humbler, and he does not make so conspicuous a figure on this floor. Had the gentleman proposed to search out the best seed of corn, or any of those fruits of the earth which enter so largely into the comforts of life, there would have been more reason in this proposition: but when only a small portion of the agriculture of the country was proposed to be encouraged at the expense of the rest, he felt bound to protest against it, in behalf of the common farmers—the people who are the stay of the Government in peace, and a strong pillar of defence in war. Why select a single staple to spend the public money upon? If gentlemen engaged in the cultivation of sugar wished this information, Mr. C. suggested that they had better be left to purchase it for themselves, and pay for it out of the rich revenues of their large estates, and not drain the treasury to advance one interest at the expense of the rest.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, rose, and said: As I had the honor to introduce the resolution upon which the Committee on Agriculture were instructed to inquire into the expediency of the measure proposed, and now under consideration, it may be considered incumbent on me to say

Proposed Reduction of the Tariff.

a word or two in its support. The article to which this resolution refers, is one of daily use, and almost universal consumption among all classes of the civilized world. From having been employed formerly as a medicine, it has now become one of the principal objects of consumption and commerce, combining value in use with value in exchange. It is no longer considered a luxury even to the poor, but of indispensable necessity, and general use. The measure proposed, to increase the product either for home consumption, or for foreign exportation, must be viewed as one of no small importance.

The depressed state of the cotton market, and its greatly diminished value, has given an increased interest to all suggestions for the promotion of other articles which promise advantage to the agriculturist, and an accumulation of the national wealth. The subject itself is not interesting alone to that geographical section of the country, in which the sugar cane has been or may be cultivated; it connects itself with the wants and comforts of every consumer in the United States. The collection of different varieties of the cane found in more northern latitudes, the discovery of new processes in fabrication and manufacture, and the demonstration of the facts by experiment, attested by competent persons, will double the value of twenty millions of acres of land belonging to the United States, within the latitude in which there can be no question the cane will flourish. The expenses attending the cultivation of the cane so far exceed that of any other plant or vegetable, that those who embark in it properly must understand the grounds on which they proceed. Those who wish to extend it farther north cannot confine themselves to the very little information possessed in Louisiana and the West Indies. It is known that most valuable acquisitions to the stock of knowledge possessed by them have been made by the recent experiments in France and Spain on the beet root, and lately on the cane, in Guadeloupe. This subject has not only occupied the attention of the most profound chemists of the present day, but of the most practical political economists of Europe. The various works through which the scattered materials of a good system, or well digested manual, might be formed, are not accessible to any one planter, and even if obtained by any one, he has not the means of arranging, translating, and disseminating it for the general benefit.

The labors of De Caseaux and Detrone on the cane, and of Achard and Chaptal on the beet, have not been seen by perhaps a half dozen planters in this country, perhaps not a single one. The plan proposed for collecting in one convenient and accessible form this valuable information is simple and inexpensive, and within the acknowledged powers of the Government. It has been the practice heretofore by a resolution similar to this, for the collection of facts as to the cultivation of silk, and the still more important instance in which Congress granted a township of land to French emigrants for the cultivation of the olive and vine.

It is not the planter and consumer alone that is interested in extending the cultivation of cane, and manufacture of sugar. The Western States have a new market opened for their provisions, and the Northern and Eastern for engines, kettles, mills, and machinery, from their iron foundries. There is no portion of our Union, and no class of our population, who are not deeply concerned in the promotion of this great and growing article of domestic industry. The French Government have deemed it an object of sufficient magnitude to devote to it a great deal of time and money.

This resolution proposes the collection and dissemination of the improvements made in the fabrication and refinement of sugar; and another, reported by the same, provides for the collection of all the varieties of the cane, from more northern latitudes. This is also proposed to be effected in an easy and inexpensive manner, through our consuls and commanders of foreign armed vessels from abroad.

There are now three kinds in the United States. The Creole, brought from Madeira; the Otaheite, from the islands of the Pacific Ocean; and the ribbon, from Batavia. If it be true that vegetables like animals become acclimated, and put on a thicker covering as they are gradually cultivated farther north, the same species, planted for centuries in a more rigorous climate, may have changed its properties most materially, and might now be transplanted in the same latitude on this continent, when it would require otherwise the same time here to climatize itself. We are said to be indebted to India for the cane, from whence it was carried to Persia and China, and from thence obtained by the Greeks and Romans, who, from want of knowledge of granulation, only used the juice as medicine. The Saracens carried it to Cyprus, Sicily, Spain, Madeira, and the Cape de Verd Islands. There can be no doubt but that a most valuable acquisition may be made to our natural agriculture by the adoption of these resolutions. I saw, only a few days since, in the work of a recent traveller in Peru, the return of an Intendant to the Government, in which it was stated that the sugar cane in one of the provinces grew eleven months in the year, and ripened five feet high; and from their ignorance of the processes of sugar making, it was difficult to produce any thing. In our country the cane only grows eight months, and only ripens two feet; and, destitute as we are of a full knowledge of the subject, our production is annually increasing. It was considered an experiment for fifteen years in the commencement of sugar making in Louisiana. What was experiment then, is experience now. What is now doubt and uncertainty, will be practice and demonstration in a few years to come.

I cannot, for a moment, believe that a measure so simple and beneficial will not receive the concurrent vote of this House.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolutions, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

[From the 26th of January to the 4th of February, inclusive, there was no debate of sufficient interest to be inserted in the Register. The bill for taking the fifth census was the principal subject acted upon.]

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1830.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. McDUFFIE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the 30th day of June, 1830, the following duties shall be levied, in lieu of those now imposed by law, on the following articles, viz.

On iron, in bars and bolts, whether manufactured by hammering or rolling, ninety cents per hundred and twelve pounds; provided, that all iron in slabs, blooms, and loops, and other form less finished than iron in bars and bolts, except pig or cast iron, shall be rated as iron in bars and bolts, and pay duty accordingly.

On iron in pigs, fifty cents per hundred and twelve pounds.

On hemp, unmanufactured, thirty-five dollars per ton.

On flax, unmanufactured, thirty-five dollars per ton.

On cotton bagging, three cents and three-fourths per square yard.

On unmanufactured wool, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, until the 30th of June, 1831, and five per cent. less every year, until the duty shall be reduced to fifteen per cent. ad valorem; provided, that all wool, the actual value of which at the place whence imported shall not exceed ten cents per pound, shall pay a duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem, and no more, from and after the 30th of June next.

On all manufactures of wool, and of which wool shall be a component part, except worsted stuff goods and blankets, which shall pay twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, a duty of thirty-three and a third per cent. ad valorem.

On all manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton shall be a component part, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem; provided, that all such manufactures, except nankeens, imported directly from China, the original cost of which at the place whence imported, with the addition of twenty per cent. if imported from the Cape of Good Hope or beyond it, and of ten per cent. if imported from any other place, shall be less than thirty cents per square yard, shall, with such addition, be taken and deemed to have cost thirty cents per square yard, and charged with duty accordingly.

On salt, ten cents per bushel of fifty-six pounds.

On brown sugar, — cents per pound.

On white clayed sugar, — cents per pound.

On molasses, four cents per gallon.

On linseed, hempseed, and rapeseed oil, fifteen per cent. ad valorem.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the same drawback shall be allowed on the exportation of spirits distilled in the United States from foreign molasses, as was allowed previous to the passage of the act entitled 'An act in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports,' approved 19th May, 1828."

The bill having received its first reading,

Mr. RAMSAY, of Pennsylvania, from a decided objection to the introduction of the discussion of such a bill at this session, objected to its being read a second time.

According to the rules of the House, in case of such objection, the question was stated, "Shall the bill be rejected?" And, on this question, the yeas and nays were ordered to be taken.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, rose to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the total futility of thus attempting to destroy this bill. If he were to succeed in his object, the discussion of the subject would not thereby be prevented; for the propositions contained in the bill could be revived in various forms. It seemed to him [Mr. C said] that this proceeding was very small game. He did hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would withdraw his motion, and let the subject take its usual course. It was a very harsh procedure towards any committee of this House to stop a bill of this importance and interest on its first reading. There were kindred questions already before committees of this House; and when they came up, the principles of this bill could readily be introduced, by way of amendment, &c. if the gentleman were to succeed in procuring its rejection now.

Mr. RAMSAY said he could not concur with the gentleman who considered this proceeding small game. He considered it large game, and such as the House ought now to pursue. Wasting the time of the House, he considered to be small game; and any course which should prevent the misspending of the time of the House, he should consider that a large game. He believed [he said] that there was not a member of the House whose mind was not made up beforehand on the question presented by the bill. For his part, he wanted the tariff law, which the House had so much trouble in passing, and which the gentleman from New York had so strenuously opposed, to have a fair trial. He did not wish it brought up here until it had been tested by fair experiment. He meant no disrespect to the gentleman from New York, but he could not consent to withdraw his objection.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR rose, not to engage in debate on this subject, but to remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania that his formal objection to the second reading of the bill would only have the effect to consume the time of the House: Whenever the House should be in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it would be perfectly competent for the gentleman from New York, or any other gentleman, to offer, in the shape of a resolution or resolutions, identically the same propositions as are contained in this bill; and in Committee of the Whole there was no means by which he could arrest the progress of the discussion. So that, if the gentleman succeeded in preventing the second reading of the bill, it would not in the smallest degree serve his object. Mr. B. said, in reference to this subject generally, that he wished to have it discussed; not from any particular desire to make a speech about it, but he wished it brought into view in reference to the present condition and circumstances of the country. He wished the question to be fairly presented, whether we shall continue a rate of duty on imports beyond what the wants of the country and the demands of the treasury require; whether, for any cause, the country is to have a settled, immovable tariff of the present extent; whether, under the power to raise a revenue for defraying the expenses of the Government, it was intended to bring into the treasury an overflowing stream of revenue not wanted for the ordinary purposes of the Government, for the distribution of which, after it shall have been forcibly extracted from the pockets of the people, there is to be a never-ending struggle on the floor of this House. Some time during the session he was desirous that this subject should be examined with that attention which its importance deserved.

Mr. STRONG, of New York, desirous to defer, for the present, a discussion which might occupy the whole of this day and to-morrow, to the exclusion of private bills which are the order of the day, moved to lay the bill on the table.

On this question the yeas and nays were ordered, at the instance of Mr. CAMBRELENG.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, wishing to have a full house on this question, moved a call of the House; which was agreed to.

The roll was therefore called, and upwards of a hundred and ninety members were found to be present.

By the time the call of the roll was completed, the hour allotted to the consideration of morning business had expired, and the subject was laid over to another day.

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce and modify the duties upon certain imported articles, and to allow a drawback on spirits distilled from foreign molasses.

The question on the motion made by Mr. STRONG, on the 5th instant, that the said bill do lie on the table, re-occurred, and, being put, was decided as follows: yeas, 107 — nays, 79.

So the subject was ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1830.

[After disposing of a number of motions for inquiry, the remainder of this day's sitting was spent in considering the General Appropriation bill.]

DIPLOMATIC EXPENSES.

The bill making appropriations for the civil list for the current year being under consideration,

Mr. INGERSOLL said, he rose to correct an error to which the debate of yesterday had led, in regard to one head of appropriation. He alluded to the salaries and outfits of foreign ministers, and the contingent expenses of the missions. It had been yesterday stated by an honorable member of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. VERPLANCK] that, although the appropriation now asked for was large, in consequence of the new missions instituted during the recess of Congress, or rather by sending out new men to old missions, yet, that even the sum now required for these purposes did not swell the amount beyond our former appropriations for foreign missions. Indeed, it was said that the money required for our ministers and diplomatic agents, under the last administration, had been more in some years than is now required. In these statements, he believed the honorable member who made them was wrong, entirely wrong; and he [Mr. I.] would now endeavor to set the matter right. There had not been a year during the preceding four years, that the diplomatic expenses had equalled the sum now asked for. No, sir, not excepting the year of the Panama mission, which had been the means of characterizing the late as a diplomatic administration, by those opposed to it, was there as much required as we are now about to appropriate. The bill proposes to give one hundred and eighty thousand dollars for the salaries and outfits of our diplomatic agents, and for the contingent expenses of the several missions. Let us compare this sum with what we gave in 1826, the first year of the late administration. By a careful examination of the act of that year, he found that, for these purposes, there was appropriated but one hundred and forty-seven thousand five hundred dollars. In 1827, we appropriated for the same objects one hundred and fifty-one thousand dollars. Well, sir, these were large sums, but still falling considerably short of what is now required. But these sums, though appropriated, were not all expended; and when we came to the year 1828, the gentleman then at the head of the State Department informed us that there was on hand an unexpended balance of former appropriations, amounting to one hundred thousand dollars, and he only asked for an additional sum of forty-nine thousand dollars to carry that branch of the service through the year. The next year, 1829, we appropriated by two acts, the one for the first quarter, and the next for the three quarters of the year, in all one hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars. The average amount for the four years of the late administration was one hundred and twenty-one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars for each year, and we are now starting anew, by appropriating one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, to cover the expenses of diplomacy for the current year.

Mr. I. said, he did not make these statements with a view of finding fault with the items which we are now considering, but he felt it due to others, as well as himself, to state, in as few words as he could, on which administration the difference of expenditure was chargeable.

Before he resumed his seat, he would say a few words as to the sources from which the outfits of the new ministers, during the last summer, had been taken; because, as had been before stated yesterday, these outfits were said to be derived from the diplomatic fund; and we all know that the last Congress declined making any specific appropriations for outfits, nor is there any such thing as a diplomatic fund; he meant a fund by that name. The money, in the absence of a specific appropriation for outfits, was undoubtedly taken by the Executive from the item of contingent expenses. We had heard something about these contingent expenses, and also about the practice of paying outfits from such sources, a year or two ago. The Retrenchment Committee, he believed, had put the seal of condemnation on that practice; at any rate, another committee of the same Congress, the Committee on the Expenditures of the State Department, over which an honorable member over the way, from Tennessee, ably presided, had, in 1828, denied the rights of the Executive to pay diplomatic outfits, unless authorized by a specific appropriation. This, we are told, was the true doctrine then. The able report then drawn up by the committee took the ground that the contingent fund was not subject to the payment of salaries and outfits of ministers and chargés, their compensation being specific subjects of appropriation. The committee called that practice a usurpation of power, if he rightly remembered the term. He would not stop to ask whether that was defensible now, which was usurpation in 1828. His principal object was to correct the errors which had been, as he presumed, inadvertently made, in comparing the sums now asked with what had been given under a former administration; and, having accomplished his object in that particular, he should drop the subject.

Mr. VERPLANCK said he did not intend, yesterday, to make a comparison of the economy of this and the last administration, but had then found himself called upon to defend the committee which reported the bill. He had then unintentionally committed an error in the statement he made yesterday, by not adding to the one hundred and eighty thousand dollars the sum of thirty thousand dollars, when comparing the present appropriation with that of former years. Still, on the showing of the gentleman from Connecticut himself, the present appropriation is defensible, for, compared with that made the year of the Panama mission, it is very much less, and, with that of the preceding year, it is still three or four thousand dollars less. Mr. V. said he did not wish to turn this debate into a party question. The part of the bill containing provisions explains itself—and the cause of the increase is, that at the first year of a new administration outfits are required which will not be necessary again. But [he said] since it was invited, he would make a relative comparison of the expenditures in this respect, from an estimate he had himself made. Mr. Adams was Secretary of State in 1825, when he was elected President, and he himself prepared the appropriation bills for the first year of his own administration. After a long series of appropriations for foreign intercourse, balances of appropriation for foreign intercourse had been left, and this advantage he had, besides, with his own political friends abroad; few recalls were necessary. Yet Mr. Adams obtained two hundred and thirteen thousand dollars for the first year of his administration. The year after, and corresponding with this year of the present administration, Congress had granted him for this object the sum of one hundred and eighty-seven thousand five hundred dollars, to which is to be added the appropriation of forty thousand dollars for the Panama mission. How stood the account of what was deemed necessary for the two first years of Mr. Adams's administration? The sum of four hundred and forty-two thousand dollars was deemed proper, and so estimated by the department, for the two first years of that administration. Let us take the two first years of the present administration, and examine what the amount of the corresponding appropriations will be. There was, when the last administration went out, a surplus of contingent funds in hands to a considerable amount. The Secretary of State, with a laudable accuracy, asked for no increase, but said the surplus fund (thirty thousand dollars) was sufficient. Under these circumstances, the sum of one hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars was appropriated last year, without any surplus fund. Public reasons—reasons which seemed good to the Executive, and which this was not the place to discuss, induced some recalls to be made, and other ministers to be appointed in their place. Mr. Brown, besides, voluntarily returned from France, and it was necessary to appoint a successor to him. A full minister, in consequence of the boundary question, was required in Holland, where a chargé only formerly was required. Under these circumstances, Government now asks for two hundred and ten thousand dollars, which will make an aggregate amount of three hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars for the two first years of General Jackson's administration, while that of the former administration, for the corresponding period, was four hundred and forty-two thousand dollars—the difference in favor of this administration being about one hundred thousand dollars. Whether even all this sum is to be expended, he could not say, although there was good reason to expect that even the whole of it would not be needed. The only information he had on this subject, was derived from the documents which have been transmitted to the House from the Executive within a few days—(the message in relation to our foreign intercourse,) by which it appeared we were to go back to the good old act of 1810, which is to be in future strictly applied—a law, than which there is none in the statute book more precisely worded, nor one which had been more loosely construed. Thus, we shall not have any more constructive journeys—constructed messengers. We shall have no more outfits for accidental charges for a six week's mission—no more appropriations of forty thousand dollars for roving ministers to look for a Congress which was not to be found, unless, perhaps, in the moon, where, according to the old poetical fancy which had recently received the diplomatic sanction of Mr. Adams, "all things lost on earth are to be found."

Mr. INGERSOLL said, he had not the most distant idea, when he rose on this subject, to give to the debate what the gentleman from New York [Mr. VERPLANCK] had called a party turn. It was in answer to an inquiry made by the chairman of the Retrenchment Committee, [said Mr. I.] that, yesterday, I stated the causes of the increase, for the present year, of the diplomatic expenses of the country. I did this in as unexceptionable a manner as I was capable of doing it. The gentleman from New York followed on the other side, and saw fit to indulge in an unnecessary, and, as I thought, unmerited attack on the expenditures of the late administration. Whatever, therefore, of party has mingled in this discussion, the gentleman may thank himself for. I am acting, and have acted, on the defensive throughout. He now acknowledges that he was in part mistaken, yesterday, in his estimate of the expenses of the late administration, but still insists that the first year of Mr. Adams's was more expensive in this particular, than the first year of the present administration. If the gentleman will turn to the book, and examine for himself, he will find that he is as far out of the way here, as he was in his other statements yesterday. He is altogether mistaken in this matter, or there is no truth in figures. The year 1826 required but about one hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars for the missions, and all of that sum was not expended, but went to help out the expenditures of one of the succeeding years. Again, we are told that during Mr. Monroe's administration, and while the late President was in the Department of State, very large appropriations were made, the unexpended balances of which went to eke out the minister's salaries and perquisites, under the last administration. Surely he could not have been aware where this assertion was to lead him, or he would have paused much before he made it. Large diplomatic appropriations under Mr. Monroe, and through the influence of his Secretary of State! Why, sir, the largest appropriation made during that period was in 1825, when the new Governments on our own continent had been acknowledged independent; in consequence of which, the diplomatic corps was about doubled, and even then the amount appropriated for foreign missions was not over one hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars; still less, it will be observed, than you are now asking for by the bill on your table. Let us see how the other years preceding ranged, in these expenses, which we have been told were so enormous. In 1824, there was appropriated one hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars—not yet up to the mark of the present year. In 1823, only seventy-four thousand dollars were appropriated, not half of what is now required; and in 1822, there was appropriated eighty-three thousand dollars; that is, nearly one hundred thousand less than is now necessary to pay the diplomatic corps. Will it be said, in the face of these sums, that there was an extravagance in Mr. Monroe, chargeable to his Secretary of State, when not a year can be found in which these expenses have run up to their present amount? The gentleman from New York has indeed said, that it became necessary to reform some of the ministers during the recess of Congress, and hence our present heavy expense. We once were taught to believe that reform and retrenchment were to go hand in hand; but they are now, it would seem, to be separated, and the first year of the reign of reform shows us, instead of a retrenchment, an increase which would of itself have broken down the administration which went before it. And not only an increase of this patronage, but even the doctrine of specific appropriations is getting to be rather obsolete, and outfits not provided for by the appropriation acts are now taken from the diplomatic fund. Let it not be said that I complain of this—the Executive has an undoubted right to do as has been done; but I do complain that gentlemen, when they get in, should so soon forget what was their favorite doctrine when they were out.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he had not expected that the House would have entered into a party debate upon this question, and he trusted it would not now seriously engage in such a discussion. The two gentlemen who had addressed the House upon different sides of the question, appeared to him to have taken but a narrow view of the subject. It was decidedly his opinion that, in our intercourse with foreign nations, we should pursue a liberal and wise, rather than a narrow and short-sighted policy. It was the interest and the duty of this country to cherish the good opinion of foreign nations; and in our intercourse with them, if we acted upon narrow principles, we might find that, in realizing a small gain, the country might sustain a heavy loss. We should view this subject as statesmen, and never hesitate to provide the means necessary to enable the Executive to sustain both the character and the cause of this country, in intercourse with other nations. Mr. B. said he was, therefore, astonished to hear gentlemen comparing the relative cost of our foreign intercourse in different years, and under different administrations, as if there were no other question to be considered, but which administration had spent the least money.

Sir, [said Mr. B.] I was one of those who condemned the last administration, not so much on account of the amount of its expenditures in our foreign intercourse, as because, in practice, it repealed the law of 1810. A practice had grown up within the last twenty years, which at least violated both the letter and the spirit of that act. One precedent in violation of law was established, which gave birth to many others. At last this act was so wholly disregarded by the last administration, that they suffered a minister, upon leaving a foreign country, to convert his secretary of legation into a chargé des affaires, and as such paid a full salary and outfit, although he returned home a very short time after the minister. This was not only without law, but expressly against law. He had not the least right to such an allowance. It was not a question whether the contingent fund ought to have been resorted to for his payment; but it was a case in which the President had no right, under the law, to allow him one cent, out of any fund, beyond his salary as secretary of legation. Mr. B. was willing that those matters should now rest in oblivion, and he would never voluntarily call them forth to the light. He had opposed the practice of the last administration, not because they had paid just demands out of the contingent fund, but because they had made donations to individuals in express violation of the existing laws.

Mr. B. said, the true reason why the appropriation necessary for our foreign intercourse was greater the present than it had been the past year, was, that several of our ministers had been recalled, and others had been appointed in their stead, whom it was necessary to provide with outfits. Would any gentleman question the right of the Executive to pursue this course? For this conduct he was answerable to no tribunal but that of the American people. The appointment of foreign ministers was peculiarly within the province of the Executive. The constitution and laws of the United States had reposed in him this discretion; and it must be an extreme case indeed in which the House of Representatives ought to withhold the necessary appropriation. He presumed no gentleman in the House would say that such a case now existed. He had risen to say thus much; and he hoped to see the appropriation made without further discussion.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, said that he agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who had just taken his seat, as to the cause of the increase in the appropriation. That gentleman had stated it to be the recall of several of the foreign ministers, and the outfits of their successors; and it was evident, from the comparison of the bill of this year with the appropriation law of the last, that such was the fact. He also agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the recall and appointment of ministers was a matter of Executive discretion; and that it was only in an extreme case that the House would be justifiable in interposing to withhold an appropriation for the outfit of a minister thus appointed. But Mr. E. begged to recall to the recollection of the House the manner in which this debate arose. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] had put the question to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, why the appropriation for the diplomatic service of the year amounted to one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, while, the last year, it was but one hundred and thirty-seven thousand dollars? To this inquiry the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had replied, that there had been, previous to the last year, an accumulation of unexpended balances of former appropriations, which had rendered it necessary to appropriate less for 1829; but that these surpluses being now all expended, a larger sum was required for this year. With great deference to the source from which this statement proceeded, Mr. E. could not agree to its correctness. He did not find, in looking at the estimate from the Department of State for 1829, that there was any such surplus under this head of appropriation.

[Here Mr. E. gave way to an explanation from Mr. McDUFFIE.]

Mr. McDUFFIE rose in explanation. He said that it was far from his intention to make any party allusions, or any observations which could possibly be construed into such, in relation to that appropriation. He referred, on this point, to the explanation made by him on the preceding day, in answer to the member from Connecticut, [Mr. INGERSOLL] and concluded by stating that he trusted he should not be considered an authority for the debate which had taken place.

Mr. EVERETT resumed. He said that the gentleman's explanation was in accordance with his own view of the case; and he was about himself immediately to state that the surplus alluded to was in a different fund, for which no appropriation at all was made in 1829; and that, consequently, the increase of forty thousand dollars in the diplomatic service of the present year, over the last, was not owing to any such surplus being added to the appropriation of 1829. It was an increase of expenditure, owing, as the gentlemen from Pennsylvania stated, to the recall of the foreign ministers, and the outfits of their successors. Supposing this matter to be now understood all around the House, he should say no more about it. He must, however, dwell a moment on another point, connected with this appropriation, in which, after what had been said, he need not disclaim being a volunteer. These outfits, to the amount of over forty thousand dollars, have been paid without any specific appropriation. On the contrary, a gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE] last winter, proposed, in Committee of the Whole, to make an appropriation for the outfits of ministers who might be appointed; and the committee declined making such an appropriation. They passed the bill as they found it, with specific appropriations for certain designated salaries and outfits, with an estimated addition for contingencies, he believed, of twenty thousand dollars. This looked rather, when considered in connexion with the refusal of the committee just alluded to, like excluding all outfits not provided for by the bill. And yet, notwithstanding this, forty thousand dollars in outfits, for which no appropriation had been made, have been paid during the last summer. Mr. E. did not mention this as criminating the present administration, but as vindicating the past. It had been asserted and reiterated, here and elsewhere, that the late administration had improperly paid outfits out of the contingent fund, and transferred to one object what was specifically appropriated to another. Now here we have forty thousand dollars expended in outfits, without any specific appropriation; although two outfits, if he recollected, were specified in the act of the last year. From what fund the money had been taken, he could hardly tell. That part of the estimate was not very clear. There is no such thing as a diplomatic fund known to the appropriation law. The sum now asked for appears to be asked as a repayment of so much taken from other items. Of this, Mr. E. was not disposed to complain; but he hoped gentlemen would now feel how unjustly the late administration had been condemned for a course so soon adopted by the present, and which must, of necessity, be adopted by any administration.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he had never denied that outfits, under such circumstances, were to be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. EVERETT replied, that he did not maintain that the gentleman from South Carolina individually had held this doctrine; but it had been distinctly laid down in the reports of two committees of the House, at the last Congress—the Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of State, and the Retrenchment Committee. The latter committee had recommended the abolition of the fund for the contingent expenses of the foreign missions, on the ground that it enabled the Executive, at his own discretion, to augment the allowances to the foreign ministers.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked if the gentleman from Massachusetts was not mistaken. It was the secret service money, and not the contingent fund, which the Committee on Retrenchment proposed to suppress. Was not the gentleman confounding one subject with the other?

Mr. EVERETT. I am not mistaken. The Committee on Retrenchment proposed to abolish the fund appropriated for the contingent expenses of all the missions abroad, as the gentleman will find by turning to their report.

Mr. NORTON said, that, in the whole course of his legislative life, he had never thought it necessary to build up a political reputation, by advocating a false system of economy. He should vote for the bill reported by the distinguished statesman at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means. He [Mr. N.] had not come here to condemn the late administration, nor to applaud the present one, whether right or wrong. But he must say, that the illustrious individual who had been elected to the chair of State, was, he was convinced, actuated in the administration of the affairs of Government by the best and purest motives. He believed the President to be a bold and honest man; and he was firmly convinced that, whilst he was surrounded by his present wise and patriotic advisers, the liberties of the country would be secure.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Judiciary Bill.

[FEB. 11 to 16, 1830.]

[On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, there was no debate of sufficient consequence to be published in the Register of Debates.]

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1830.

THE JUDICIARY BILL.

The House, on motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Judiciary bill.

Mr. HUNTINGTON addressed the committee at considerable length against the bill, after which the committee rose.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1830.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and took up the Judiciary bill.

Mr. HUNTINGTON concluded his remarks against the bill. They were as follows:

I rise to address the committee, under a deep sense of the responsibility I assume, in attempting to reply to the very able argument of the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] who opened this debate, and that of the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK] who followed him; and with a deep feeling of my entire inability to sustain the views, which, in my judgment, belong to this interesting and important subject. Believing, however, that the extension of the judicial system, as proposed by this bill, is fraught with evils of no inconsiderable magnitude; that its tendency is to impair the individual responsibility of the judges of the highest judicial tribunal of the nation, and the public confidence in them; that the system which this bill proposes to extend cannot be permanent, nor be continued, with a due regard to the rights of parties litigant in the Supreme Court; and, thinking, as I do, that the evils which are supposed to exist from its confined operation may be remedied, by the adoption of a system not obnoxious to the objections which exist to this bill, I have been induced to assume the responsibility to which I have alluded, and to ask of the committee their kind indulgence, while, as succinctly as is practicable, and to the extent of my limited capacity, I submit to them the reasons on which the opinions I have thus generally expressed are founded: and I shall need all the kindness and courtesy which the committee are willing to extend to one, whose habits have been professional, whose discussions have been confined to the bar, and whose remarks are to be applied to a subject which, not many years ago, was exhausted by the learning and talents of some of the most distinguished men of this country, which were bestowed upon it. Feebly; however, as I shall discuss it, I feel no inconsiderable consolation in the reflection that the intrinsic importance of the subject will demand for it the undivided attention of the committee.

This bill operates upon a department of the Government, in comparison with which every other department is powerless. It affects a tribunal which hears and adjudicates not only upon the conflicting claims of private citizens, but one which, while it opens the book of the constitution, and points sovereignty itself to the clause "Thus far mayest thou come, but no farther"—holds in its hand the chain which confines it within the prescribed limits. Well, then, did the honorable member from Pennsylvania say, the subject was important. The remark was worthy of the subject, and the source from which it proceeded.

I listened with much attention, and, I will add, with much pleasure, too, (as I always do when the honorable member from Pennsylvania favors us with his remarks on any subject,) to the very able and lucid statement which he made of the reasons which induced the committee, of which he is the organ, to present this bill for our consideration. I noticed how, with the hand of a master, he drew the great outlines, the leading features of our judicial system, as it has existed from the first organization of the Government to the present time: I heard him point out the duties, the responsibilities, and the powers of the Supreme Court; the benefits which had followed the adoption of the present system; the evils which would result from its abandonment; and the necessity of its extension to the new States. He will do me the justice to believe me sincere, when I say I heard him with a desire to be convinced that my objections to this bill were groundless; he but will pardon me for saying, that although I was instructed by his learning, and gratified with the manner in which it was communicated, I still retain the same opinion as when this discussion commenced; and that is, that this bill ought not to become a law. The reasons for entertaining this opinion I am now to submit to the committee.

To arrive at a correct result as to the leading feature of the bill, that which proposes to add two to the present number of the justices of the Supreme Court, an answer to two inquiries into which the subject very naturally and obviously divides itself, seems necessary.

Are there evils attending the practical operations of our judicial system, as limited and confined by existing regulations, which require any remedy?

If there are, does this bill furnish both an adequate one, and the best, which, under all the circumstances, can be adopted?

The evils complained of, and for which this bill is intended to provide, exist in one form, and are of one character, in the States of Indiana, Illinois, Mississippi, Missouri, Alabama, and Louisiana; and in another form, and are of another character, in the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio.

To the former, the circuit court system is not extended at all; and the complaint is, not that their judicial business is not finished, but that it is not as well done as it would be were a justice of the Supreme Court assigned to them. To the latter, the system is nominally extended; but, from a variety and combination of causes, the benefits of it are not realized: their complaint is, not that their judicial business is not well done, but that the unavoidable delay in completing it is tantamount to a denial of justice.

The source from whence these complaints proceed, and the manner in which they have been presented to us, claim the most respectful consideration; and, if well founded, however we may differ as to the mode of redressing them, I trust we shall not differ as to the extent of their rights, or of our duties. I do not intend to trespass long upon the patience of the committee by the remarks which I shall make upon this branch of the subject; for, with the views which I entertain regarding the remedy proposed, it might safely be admitted that the evils complained of are as extensive as has been supposed. But as this bill is professionally framed to supply the wants, the absolute necessities, and to sustain the just rights of the States, to which I have referred; as no disposition has been manifested by any member to increase the number of the justices of the Supreme Court, except for these reasons, it may be well briefly to examine and ascertain, if practicable, how far the complaints which have been made are well founded; what real necessity does exist for the increase. And if I do not very much mistake, it will be found that the state of judicial business in the courts of the United States, in these States, will not justify, nor does it require, any such addition—at least, from the information now before the committee, the necessity adverted to is not shown to exist.

I begin with the six younger States. The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. BUCHANAN] has informed the committee that the parental care of the Government, so far as it regards the equal and due administration of justice in the federal courts, is withdrawn from them.

FEB. 16, 1830.]

The Judiciary Bill.

[H. of R.]

Of this they complain, because it denies to them an equality of rights and privileges with the other States, and thus mortifies what is sometimes called State pride, and excites State jealousy.

I have no disposition to deny the proposition, that, by the terms of admission, the new States are placed on an entire equality with the old States as to rights and duties; and if I had the disposition, I have not the power to do it, consistently either with the letter or spirit of the acts of Congress authorizing their admission. Nor, in what I am now about to say, shall I be justly obnoxious to the imputation of entertaining unkind feelings towards the new States. Coming, as I do, from one of the old States of the Union, and from a State from which the tide of emigration has heretofore rolled with a rapidity and constancy which has not entirely ceased, I have many reasons to feel and cherish all that kindness and respect towards the younger sisters of the confederacy, (as they were very appropriately called by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] which such an endeared relation should excite. Many of the sons of Connecticut are now respectable citizens of those States; some of them are distinguished members from those States of the National Legislature. I say, therefore, with frankness and with pleasure, that I would withhold from them no one right—I would deprive them of no one privilege, which, under similar circumstances, is granted to the older States. I may, however, still be permitted to say, that this principle of equality, so far as it relates to the administration of justice in the federal courts, has never been the standard by which the judicial system of the nation has been regulated, not even in the old States of the Union. Upon the principle of entire equality, each State should have a judge of the Supreme Court; and more than one, if necessary, to enable its judicial business in the courts of the United States to be finished with the same facility and economy as in the other States.

But our judicial system does not now proceed on any such assumed basis. Why are parts of the wealthy and powerful States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, cut off from the benefits of the present system? Why are they deprived of the talents and learning of a judge of the Supreme Court? Is not this humiliating to their pride—and, yet to obviate it, the number of the judges must still further be increased. Even the bill under discussion deprives a part of the State of Louisiana, and a part of the State of Alabama, of the same benefits. If we look at the progress of our legislation on this subject, it will be obvious that no such principle as that of State pride, feeling, jealousy, ever entered into the merits of the system. Kentucky was admitted into the Union fifteen years before the present system was extended to her. Tennessee eleven years, and Ohio four years. I need not, however, press these considerations, for the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] with his usual frankness and candor, admitted that the admission of a State into the Union, though thereby placed "on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever," did not confer upon her the right to claim that the circuit court system should be extended to her immediately, and that no obligation was imposed upon Congress so to extend it, until the wants of the State required it, and the circumstances of the country permitted it to be done. I am satisfied with this standard of our duty, and I ask the committee to apply it to the present situation of the six new States. Its wants, so far as they apply to this subject, are to be ascertained by referring to the extent and amount of its business in the federal courts. I was surprised that the committee were furnished with no statement regarding it. I do not know, nor have I heard, that it is such as to require that the judicial system should be extended to them; and, being ignorant of their wants, can I vote for a bill which has been framed to supply them?

If I were allowed to hazard a conjecture, it would be that the judicial business of these States, in the courts of the United States, was very limited in amount. Their local situation, and the habits and pursuits of their inhabitants, (with the exception of the commercial cities of New Orleans and Mobile,) would seem to be such as not to produce much litigation in these courts. No memorial has been presented from any one of these States, at least none, within my recollection, stating their wants and soliciting relief.

I have obtained from the clerk of the Supreme Court a statement of the number of causes now on the docket of that court, and from what courts they have been brought up; and I was surprised to find that there were more causes from the district court of west Virginia, to which the circuit court system is not now extended, than from any one of the six new States. The whole number on the docket is stated to be one hundred and thirty-three. Of these, six are from Louisiana; seven from west Virginia; five from Missouri; two from Mississippi; three from Alabama; and from western Pennsylvania, which is excluded from the operation of the circuit court system, two. None from Illinois, none from Indiana. So that, out of one hundred and thirty-three cases, sixteen only are from the six new States, and nine from States which have no participation in the benefits proposed to be conferred on the former. I am aware that this is not a certain criterion of the actual amount of judicial business which is done in these States; for many causes are disposed of in the district courts, which cannot or do not come to the Supreme Court; but I am inclined to believe it is a safe basis upon which to calculate the extent of their litigation in the federal courts. What, then, is the result? Is it not that their wants are not so pressing as to justify the passage of this bill?

But it is alleged, as another cause of complaint, that they are deprived of the substantial benefits which result, and which the other States enjoy, from the establishment of a circuit court; admitted upon terms of full equality, they are denied an equal participation in the benefits of a judicial system, which should reach and equally protect the interests and promote the prosperity of all; that, according to the existing system, they are deprived of all the advantages resulting from the supposed superior legal acquirements of a justice of the Supreme Court; they are subjected to the delay and expense of a trial at Washington, when they might be entirely satisfied with the decision of a circuit court; that they are not allowed an appeal to the Supreme Court, unless the amount in controversy, in all cases, exceeds two thousand dollars; and in criminal cases no appeal at all.

I have already adverted to what I cannot but deem a satisfactory reply to this cause of complaint. So far as it relates to the final jurisdiction of their district courts, in cases where the demand does not exceed two thousand dollars, and in prosecutions for offences, it may easily be obviated by a modification of the present law, in these particulars. But a remark or two further may not be out of place. It seems to me, there is but little ground for this complaint. It is perhaps true, that, from the increased responsibility, the increased salary, and thus increased inducements to men of learning and talents to accept the office of a judge of the Supreme Court, the judges of that court are generally presumed to possess the requisite qualifications for such an elevated station, in a greater degree than the district judges; but, if the latter were all as well qualified (and I do not know but they are) as one with whom I have the honor of a personal acquaintance, and others whose character and reputation are well known by every lawyer, there would be no necessity to institute comparisons, nor any room for the application of the pre-emption to which I have alluded. But it is probable that if the circuit court system were extended to those States, it would have the effect to diminish the number of cases which would be brought to the Supreme Court? Would suitors, in cases of interest, be any better satisfied with trials at the circuit court, than at a district court? Would they not, in either case, remove them, if by law they could be removed, to the court of dernier resort? Is not such the ordinary, usual course?

I will now consider the subject with reference to the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio, to whom the circuit court system is extended. As to them, it is urged that there has been for many years, and now is, a great accumulation of business on the dockets of the circuit courts, which cannot be finished without the formation of new circuits, and that the delays consequent thereon are equivalent to a denial of justice. I shall not stop to recapitulate the statement which was made of the extent of this business, as it existed in 1826, when a bill similar to the present passed this House, and which was probably the principal inducement to its passage. It occurred to me, while the honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] was favoring the committee with this statement, that the experience of every lawyer evinces that it is not always the number of causes on the docket which furnishes a sure index of the actual amount of litigation; that a judgment in one would settle principles which would apply to many. I did suppose, as was suggested by the honorable member, that, in Kentucky, one source of litigation, which had tended much to increase the business in that circuit, was dried up; that an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States had put an end to the commencement of many causes in the circuit court, which would otherwise have been there. I had understood, also, that this adjudication was acquiesced in, promptly and with a good grace, by that patriotic State. She is not the only State whose laws have been subjected to the searching operation of the court of last resort. Almost every State in the Union has, at some period, had her legislative enactments tested by the constitution, through the medium of that court. I wish I could add that they had all submitted as promptly and as cheerfully to the judgments which declared their laws void, as did the patriotic, high-minded, and honorable State of Kentucky. It occurred to me, also, that many intricate questions connected with the land titles of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee had been finally settled, and thus a considerable portion of judicial business arising from that source been removed from the docket. And I had hoped we should have been furnished with a statement of the amount of judicial business, of litigated cases, at present pending in the circuit courts of these States. If the honorable members who have preceded me in this debate, had made such a statement, I should have inquired no further. I should have received it, as I do every thing which they communicate, as facts, as entitled to full and entire credit. Neither of them, however, informed the committee, or, if he did, it has escaped my memory, of the actual state of the dockets, the number of litigated cases to be heard and determined. I deemed it proper, therefore, to obtain information on this point, as I was to be called to vote upon this bill, professedly and principally framed to obtain a speedy disposition of this judicial business; and I sought it from a source in my judgment entitled to the most implicit confidence in its accuracy. I have obtained it, and I will now communicate it to the committee.

In the State of Ohio, there are two circuit courts held each year at Columbus. In the State of Kentucky, two terms at Frankfort. In the State of Tennessee, one term at Nashville, and one at Knoxville. The information as to the state of the dockets in the circuit court in these States, is, that two weeks will probably be sufficient to finish the present docket at Frankfort at the next term, about the same period at Nashville, and that at Knoxville less than a week will be required, and that two weeks in Ohio will be sufficient for the same purpose; that, under any circumstances, probably not more than two weeks and a half will be necessary at Columbus, Frankfort, or Nashville. Taking the longest period here stated, the present dockets, at the next term in those States, can be finished in thirteen and a half weeks. I think no member of this committee will believe this period will be so long as to occasion such delay as will amount to a denial of justice. No complaint has been heard from the distinguished judge who presides in that circuit, though his labors are arduous, and the distance which he is compelled to travel, long, and the fatigue great. How will the time required to dispose of the business in this circuit compare with that devoted to the same purposes by the learned judge of the Eastern circuit, which includes the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island? I make no invidious comparison of the respective labors performed by the judges of these circuits. I do it merely to evince that no new judge is wanted for the three States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio; that those States have no just cause of complaint, when the extent of their judicial business is compared with that of the States composing the Eastern circuit.

From a source entitled to full credit, I learn that in the Eastern circuit a week each term (of which there are two yearly in each State composing the circuit) is the usual time the court is in session, in Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. In Massachusetts, the terms are from three to six weeks, fluctuating much with the business. Taking an average, the terms in the four States will consume fifteen weeks. But it is to be observed that the business in term gives a faint idea of the real labors of that judge. Almost all the equity causes, and many others of difficulty, which would interrupt the trials in term, are argued in vacation, sometimes orally, often, and perhaps usually, in writing, so that a very considerable part of every vacation is occupied in hearing or deciding causes. I entertain no doubt that the labors of that judge consume nearly, if not quite, three-fourths of the year. Already has the profession the benefit of six volumes of his decisions in law and equity cases only, since he was elevated to the bench, (which I believe was in November, 1811,) and a seventh volume is nearly through the press. With a knowledge of all these facts, can it be said, with any propriety, that the wants, the necessities of the three States composing the seventh circuit require an additional judge? Is the period of thirteen and a half weeks, with the necessary travel, so long as to make the terms of the court too burdensome, and the labors of the judge too great to be endured? Does it require the physical powers of a Hercules, as supposed by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] to discharge the duties of a judge of that circuit? I cannot think it does. I cannot believe that we should be justified in making the appointment of another judge to lessen the duties of him who now performs them so well without complaint.

But should the committee suppose that the view which I have thus far taken of this subject is incorrect, that there are evils which require to be remedied, the most important part of the subject remains to be considered, and that consists in an answer to the second general inquiry stated at the commencement of my remarks:

Does this bill furnish both an adequate remedy for existing evils, and the best which under all circumstances can be adopted?

In my judgment, no worse remedy can be adopted than that which increases the number of the justices of the Supreme Court. I will briefly state the reasons for this opinion.

It tends to divide the responsibility of the judges, and thus diminishes the weight of it, which each individual judge should feel. It is a very common observation, but not the less correct, indeed it has almost the force of a truism, that in proportion as the number of agents employed to perform any service is increased beyond that necessary for its accomplishment, is the responsibility of each lessened. This springs from a principle of human nature too obvious to need illustration. I am aware that it is difficult to fix the precise limit where individual responsibility will be materially impaired by the increased number of agents, but I think it not difficult to perceive that it must be impaired, when, in the court of dernier resort, being purely a judicial tribunal, that number is nine, though there is no magic, as was said by the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK] in the number nine. We must resort to the practice of other nations, and to the different States in the Union, to guide us to a correct result on this point. In England, with the exception of the House of Lords, and, in this country, of the supreme court of errors of the State of New York, the court of dernier resort is composed of a less number than that proposed in this bill. With regard to the court in England, and that in New York, which are exceptions, they are not merely judicial tribunals, but possess and exercise legislative powers, and there is no analogy between them and the supreme appellate judicial tribunal of this country. The House of Lords, sitting as a court, review very few of the numerous cases, either in law or equity, which are yearly adjudicated by the court of chancery and the courts of King's bench and common pleas. I would appeal to many gentlemen in this House, whose observations have enabled them to form correct opinions on this subject, whether a smaller number than that proposed by this bill has not conducted to a more perfect responsibility of each member of the court, than would probably have existed had it been increased. I appeal particularly to one gentleman, whom I see in his place, [Mr. SPENCER, of New York] and whom I hope the committee will have the pleasure to hear, whose judicial character to know, is to respect and admire. I ask him to say, whether, from the observations which a long and distinguished judicial life has enabled him to make, the responsibility of each judge is not to an extent, by no means inconsiderable, greater or less, in proportion to the number of judges who compose the court. The honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] was pleased to say, that those who think the number proposed in this bill too large, confine their views too much to the several States; whereas, the true statesman looks beyond the confines of his own State, and embraces within his vision this extended republic, consisting of twenty-four States, producing a great mass of business requiring judicial investigation. I make no professions to the character of a statesman. My pursuits in life have been professional merely; but I am yet to learn that because our country is great and extended, because much judicial business is to be done in its courts, that this affects the argument which I am now urging, that an increase of numbers impairs individual responsibility. It may, on that account, require the adoption of a different system from the existing one, but in no degree does it weaken the force of the suggestions which I have made in relation to the responsibility of the judges.

An increase of the number of judges tends to produce less concentration of action, (if I may be allowed the expression,) less union of action in the court, than would otherwise exist, and as would be desirable. It is certainly important that each judge should, for himself, examine with care and attention every case, every matter of law and fact connected with it, in which he is called to pronounce an opinion. This is oftentimes a work of time and of great labor. Increase the number, and may it not be feared that it will tend to the allotment of different cases to different judges, not merely to draw up the opinion, (which is not only proper, but necessary,) but to examine the cases; and thus, instead of bringing to the aid of the litigant parties the individual learning and industry of each, the decision will in fact rest, as it will be pronounced, on the investigation of a single judge? May it not be feared that either this result will follow, or that the business of the court cannot be seasonably finished with a due regard to the rights of the parties, or that much of the time of the court will be consumed in endless discussions, especially in cases where there is any considerable complication of facts, in perhaps oftentimes fruitless endeavors to reconcile jarring opinions and different views which may be taken of the same subject? The honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] admitted, that if the judges had no circuit duties to perform, there would be danger that the consequences to which I have alluded would follow; that there would be danger that some of them would be, as he expressed it, aye or no judges. I am at a loss to perceive how the discharge of these circuit duties would destroy this characteristic. A judge, who would be an aye or no judge on the bench of an appellate tribunal, is in great danger of being less than that at the circuit.

An increase of the number of judges will tend to impair public confidence in the court. Next in importance to an upright administration of justice, is the belief that it is so administered. Indeed, it is almost as essential to the real utility of a court, that its decisions should be deemed to emanate (to use a common expression) from a pure heart and a sound head, as that such should, in fact, be their characteristics. Let the community once believe, whether from causes well or ill founded, that the decisions of this judicial tribunal are not entitled to their confidence, and the salutary effects which would otherwise follow from the exercise of their powers would be neither seen nor felt. Am I asked how this confidence of the public may be impaired by increasing the number of the court? I answer, in one or both of two ways.

By creating a belief that the court partakes more of the character of a popular assembly than of a mere judicial tribunal; that appointments are to be made to it with reference to some supposed ratio of representation in the several States; that each portion of the Union is to be regarded, whenever a vacancy occurs, or new judges are to be added, as entitled, from its wealth, population, or political importance, to furnish the incumbent; indeed, that this of itself constitutes a reason for the increase of the court; that sectional views are to be consulted, sectional importance to be considered; that an increase of the number is necessary to advance the particular interests of particular parts of the country. I need not detain the committee to point out the deleterious consequences resulting from such an impression upon the public mind. It is very obvious the court, under such circumstances, would cease to possess much of the confidence of the people.

Another way in which an addition to the number of judges might tend to weaken public confidence, would be, by presenting to public view, in many cases, a minority of the court, perhaps, a large one, in the decision of questions of great national importance. And should the minority be supposed to be superior to the majority in legal acquirements and judicial learning, the decisions in such cases would, perhaps, not be considered as possessing the force and binding authority of precedents, but would be doubted, sustained, or overruled, according to the varying opinions of the additional members of the court, as they should successively take their seats on the bench.

The system proposed to be extended by this bill cannot, in my judgment, be permanent. Sooner or later it must be abandoned. Whenever, from the increased number of States which may hereafter become a part of the Union, the increased population, and the consequent accumulation of business, it becomes necessary to add still further to the number of judges, you must then either give up the present judicial system or the Supreme Court: instead of possessing hardly the characteristic of a court, and certainly not deserving the name of one, it will, in fact, be but a popular assembly. I do not believe that any member would be willing to add one to the number of the judges, as often as the organization of a new circuit becomes necessary. And when will this period arrive? I know it cannot be ascertained with mathematical precision. The honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] says, not within half a century, nor until every gentleman now within the sound of my voice shall be sleeping the sleep of death. I cannot but consider this assertion somewhat gratuitous, as made without the reflection which he usually bestows upon every subject to which his attention is called. I think it will arrive within the period of fifteen or twenty years, and that it would not be difficult to sustain this position. But be it sooner or later, it is obvious that the time will arrive when additional judges will be required, if the present system be continued. And what will then be our situation? Under what embarrassments will the country then be placed? Why, sir, we shall have on the bench of the Supreme Court more judges than, as the honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] admits, are either necessary or useful to the due administration of justice in that court. What is to be done with them? They hold their office by the tenure of good behavior. They cannot be legislated out of office, unless the same course is resorted to, which was adopted in 1802. The court then becomes burdened with useless incumbents. Is it safe or prudent—is it expedient to continue a system which accumulates judges so far as that hereafter it will be serious cause of regret that they are in office? Is not the argument deserving consideration, that we should not go on adding to the court, when eventually the system which creates the necessity for it must be abandoned? But this is not all. Is it the dictate of wisdom, in legislating with reference to the judicial system of this extended country, to make it, at least so far as it regards the number of judges, the creature of temporary or local policy? Should not the great outlines, the leading features of it in this particular, be permanent? Ought we to adopt one system to-day to meet present exigencies, and another to-morrow, because other exigencies have arisen? Will this principle be a safe one, when applied to a tribunal created for the administration of justice, the exposition and construction of laws? Let us not shut our eyes to the light which history and observation furnish on this subject. Are the rights of individuals and of the public, when drawn into controversy in courts of justice, as uniformly sustained by an independent and enlightened administration of justice, where the organization and structure of their courts are subjected to the operation of frequent and radical changes? With a few exceptions, history, and the declarations of those competent to judge, will answer this question in the negative.

If the number of judges be increased, in conformity with the principle of the present bill, as the wants of the country may hereafter require, may it not be feared that it will be impossible that the business of the Supreme Court should be done with that despatch which a due regard to the right of suitors requires. Do our friends at the West tell us that delay is a denial of justice to them? How will it be with parties attending the Supreme Court in this capitol? Will there be no delay as to them? I have been informed that now, with the increased term of the court, two years elapse, on an average, before a case, after it is entered on the docket, is determined. The clerk has furnished me with a memorandum, from which it appears that on the 8th of January, 1827, there were one hundred and sixty cases on the docket. At the January term of the same year, seventy-seven cases were decided. On the 14th of January, 1828, there were one hundred and thirty-one cases on the docket. At the term of that year eighty-eight cases were decided. On the 12th January, 1829, there were one hundred and nineteen cases on the docket. At the term of that year fifty-three cases were decided. On the 15th of February, 1830, there were one hundred and thirty-three cases on the docket. In 1827, the court were in session sixty-eight days. In 1828, sixty-three days. In 1829, sixty-seven days. And how will the period of delay be extended, as the business of the court increases with the increase of the business of this growing country? This delay will not be attributable to the court. The judges are in no fault. It is to be attributed to the system under which they are placed. They accomplish all which the most devoted and untiring industry, and incessant application to the discharge of their duties, can accomplish. But they are obliged to adjourn before all the causes are heard and determined, to enable them to hold the circuit courts. Must not, then, the present system hereafter be abandoned, or the docket of the Supreme Court be filled with a number of litigated cases immeasurably almost exceeding that of any of the Western States which now complain of it as amounting to a denial of justice to them? Why, sir, it may be feared that the proverbial delays of the English court of chancery will not exceed the necessary delays which hereafter will attend parties litigating in the Supreme Court, if the present system be then persevered in. The hand of death will remove them before their controversies can be decided. The delay and consequent expense will consume the whole of what may eventually be awarded to them. This would be not merely a delay, it would be a mockery of justice.

I have thus, as briefly as I could, adverted to the evils which in my judgment would follow, or which might follow, from the adoption of the principle, that new judges are to be created as often as the wants of the new States require them. Were it in order, as I am aware it strictly is not, to advert to an amendment which has been printed and laid on our tables, and which an honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. DANIEL] proposes to offer hereafter to this bill, which provides that a majority of all the justices of the Supreme Court, authorized by law to be appointed and commissioned, shall concur in deciding against the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, any State, in every case in the Supreme Court, where is drawn in question the validity of such statute of, or authority exercised under, any State, on the ground of a repugnance thereof to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and, unless such majority concur, the decisions of the Court shall be entered as in favor of their validity, and which further provides that no district or circuit court shall have jurisdiction, or take cognizance of any suit, matter, or cause of action, (other than causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction,) either at common law or in equity, where the cause of action, matter, or suit arises out of, and depends solely upon, the laws of any State, and in which no statute of, or authority exercised under, any State, is drawn in question, on the ground of a repugnance thereof to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States; and if I could think it possible that this amendment would meet with the favor of the committee, I should think the bill so amended much worse than it now is; for then the tendency of the system would perhaps more obviously be to unsettle and put at hazard judicial decisions on great questions which take hold of the vital interests of this nation, to set afloat precedents regarding constitutional law, made after the fullest discussion and the most mature deliberation, and acquiesced in by every department of the Government, and by the great body of our citizens. But this is not the time to discuss the principles involved in this amendment. I abstain at present from any further remarks upon it.

I have now submitted to the committee, I am sensible in a very imperfect manner, all which I wish to say regarding the supposed necessities which have given rise to this bill, and the objections which in my judgment exist to its provisions even if those necessities did exist. My object has been to show that there are no evils attendant upon the practical operation of the present judicial system, confined, as it is, by existing regulations, which, according to the uniform course of legislation on this subject, requires a remedy, and, if there were, that the remedy proposed is worse than the disease. Should these objections be considered as deserving attention as possessing any weight, while at the same time the committee believe that a necessity does exist for the application of some remedy for existing evils, it may be expected that I should point out a better remedy for them than that which this bill proposes. This is all which remains for me to do.

The amendment of the honorable member from New York, [Mr. Strong] now more immediately under consideration, proposes a division of the States into nine judicial circuits, as follows:

The first circuit to include the States of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont:

The second circuit the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut:

The third circuit the States of New York and New Jersey:

The fourth circuit the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware:

The fifth circuit the States of Maryland and Virginia:

The sixth circuit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia:

The seventh circuit the States of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana:

The eighth circuit the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri:

The ninth circuit the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Each circuit to have a court consisting of the judges of the district courts within the circuit, who are to be invested with all the powers, and to perform all the duties now discharged by the present circuit courts; the district courts in each State to remain as they now are.

An amendment, ordered to be printed, and hereafter to be submitted by an honorable member from Vermont, [Mr. Everett] divides the States into five circuits:

The first to consist of the States of Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, and Rhode Island:

The second of the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware:

The third of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia:

The fourth of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Missouri:

The fifth of the States of Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama:

And provides for the appointment of five circuit court judges, and that the circuit court in each district of each circuit shall consist of the circuit judge of such circuit, and the district judge of such district.

Both these amendments separate the justices of the Supreme Court from their circuits.

Another amendment, which has been printed, and is to be submitted by an honorable member from New York, [Mr. Spencer] proposes to re-organize the present circuits, as follows:

The first and second circuits to remain as now constituted:

The districts of New Jersey, Eastern Pennsylvania, and Delaware, to constitute the third circuit:

The districts of Maryland, East Virginia, and North Carolina, to constitute the fourth circuit:

The districts of South Carolina and Georgia to constitute the fifth circuit:

The districts of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, to constitute the sixth circuit:

The districts of Kentucky and Tennessee to constitute the seventh circuit.

The associate justice of the Supreme Court, now residing within the present fourth circuit, to be assigned to the third circuit: The present chief justice to the fourth circuit: The associate justice now residing within the present sixth circuit, to the fifth circuit: The junior associate justice to the sixth circuit: The associate justice now residing in the present seventh circuit, to the sixth circuit.

This amendment gives all the States, excepting Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama, the benefits of the present circuit court system, and provides for the appointment of a circuit judge for the district of Mississippi, the eastern district of Louisiana, and the southern district of Alabama, with a salary adequate to ensure the acceptance of the office, by an individual possessing all the requisite qualifications to an able, enlightened, and faithful discharge of its duties. As it is not in order to discuss the two latter amendments, my observations will be confined to the one offered by the honorable member from New York, [Mr. Strong.] And I think the system which this amendment proposes to establish, far preferable to the one which the bill as reported contemplates, which increases the number of the justices of the Supreme Court.

The objections to it all grew out of the necessity which it creates for a separation of the justices of the Supreme Court from the circuits, and which confines them to the discharge of judicial duties in bank merely. They have been presented in a form the most imposing, and urged with a power which makes it indispensable that they should receive an answer. I will give it, as far as I am capable of doing it.

I shall not stop to inquire whether, by a fair construction of the constitution, the justices of the Supreme Court can be required to perform circuit court duties; for the legislation and the practice of the Government have so long assumed it, that it is perhaps too late now to recur to original principles. I shall, therefore, suppose the power to require it given to Congress. The expediency of continuing to exercise it is the only point to be considered.

The honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. Buchanan] urged as an objection to any system which should make the Supreme Court an appellate court merely, that it had been tested by experience, and failed—that such a system was adopted at the close of the administration of the elder Adams; that it was then stamped with the mark of reprobation by the people, and that a period of nearly thirty years had proved the correctness of their judgment.

I do not propose to enter upon a defence of one of the last of the acts of what has been called the stormy and turbulent administration of the elder Adams. I am not required to vindicate this “deed of darkness,” as it has been termed, the “midnight judiciary” act of 1801. I would have said of it, “requiescat in pace.” But since it has been drawn into this debate; since it has been used as a legitimate argument to prove how completely the experiment of detaching the justices of the Supreme Court from circuit duties has failed, it requires a passing notice, and it shall be a brief one.

I had hoped the honorable member, when he opened the tomb which contained the ashes of one of a political family, now as a family extinct, but which he knows once had a name and a praise in this nation, that he would have uttered one kind expression of sympathy over this relic of other days and other times. I had hoped, as he recounted the circumstances of its birth, the time and manner of its death, and the execrations with which it was followed to the grave, that, though required to expose its deformities while alive, he would have remembered, that if too young to attend the interment as a mourner, he was of the household in which it was born, and that filial affection demanded of him at least that he should have spared the suggestion that those deformities were inherited from its parents. But I do not complain of this. Tempora mutantur. I shall not do the honorable member the injustice to apply to him the rest of the quotation. But I inquire, was this system abolished because it was found by experience inconvenient—unfit for the country? Was the repeal of the judiciary act of 1801 caused by a knowledge derived from experience, that it was not suited to the circumstances of the country? What experience did it have? It was strangled in the cradle. It had hardly begun to breathe, when it came to a violent death. It lived but about one year. The act was passed in February, 1801, and repealed in March, 1802. No opportunity was afforded to test its efficiency, its competency, to meet the exigencies for which it professed to provide. And why was it repealed? It is painful to allude to it. I would not do it, had it not become necessary from the use which has been made of it in this debate; for I hope no consideration connected with former or present parties will be urged, either by the friends or the enemies of this bill. It involves no party questions. It affects no party interests. Was the act of 1801 repealed because the people had found, by a trial of it, that it was injurious to the country? Far from it. We all know no such reason could have existed. We know, also, that the repeal took place soon after the commencement of a new administration—at a period of high party excitement; and because it was believed to have been enacted to provide permanent offices for the political friends of the administration which had just ceased to exist, and who were the political enemies of the one which succeeded it. Whether this belief was well founded, and whether it justified the repeal, I do not inquire. I advert to the time and the causes of the repeal, merely to repel the assertion that any thing in the nature of an experiment was made of the utility of the system. And, if any further light be necessary to view the scene which was exhibited when that system was repealed, a distinguished member from Pennsylvania, near me, [MR. HEMPHILL] who was then a member of this House, and whose able speech in opposition to the repeal many of us have read, can furnish it.

The honorable member urged as another objection to a system which should separate the justices of the Supreme Court from the circuits, that it would produce a deleterious effect on public opinion; that such a system removes the judges from immediate contact with the people, and thus renders them objects of distrust and jealousy, rather than of confidence and respect. And, as an illustration of the principle, the honorable member referred us to the illustrious individual who is now the chief justice of the United States, and has asked whether he would have sustained the deserved reputation which he now enjoys, had he never been known except by the judgments which he has pronounced from a gloomy and vaulted apartment in this capitol? It does not, perhaps, become the humble individual who now addresses the committee even to mention the name of Chief Justice Marshall; sure I am that no words of mine can add to the reputation, as pure as it is brilliant, of this great and good man; but I may be permitted to unite with the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [MR. BUCHANAN] from whom it with great propriety proceeded, in that just tribute of praise which he paid to one who unites in his person all the eminent judicial qualities of a Hale, a Holt, and a Mansfield; whose learning and talents have shed a brilliant lustre on the pages of American jurisprudence, and whose high and elevated character will be remembered, respected, and loved, centuries after he shall have slept with his fathers. And I am yet to learn that he is indebted for this reputation to his intercourse with the people, in the discharge of his duties at the circuit. I concur in the opinion that public confidence in the supreme judicial tribunal is essential, perhaps indispensable; but I cannot admit that it is either acquired or retained by the performance of circuit duties. What kind of intercourse is it which a judge has with the people while holding a circuit court? Is it of that nature which produces confidence in his judicial decisions? Is it not confined principally to professional men, and to those who would have the same confidence were the circuit courts abolished? Have the citizens of the South or West, who never saw the present chief justice, or the distinguished judges of the first or second circuits, any feelings of jealousy or any want of confidence in them? Have not the people of the Eastern States the same respect for, the same confidence in, the learned judge of the Carolina and Georgia circuits, which are felt for him by those who witness the able manner in which his judicial duties are discharged at the circuit? It is not the intercourse of a judge with the people which creates either respect or confidence. It is his character for integrity, independence, judicial learning, which produces it; and a knowledge of that character is acquired, not through the medium of personal intercourse, but from the judicial opinions which he pronounces.

The honorable member suggested, as another reason why the judges of the Supreme Court should not be detached from circuit duties, that it would bring them and their families from their present places of residence to this city, to reside permanently. And he asked whether there is not danger that, in the lapse of time, they would be converted into minions of the Executive? that they would become contaminated, by breathing the corrupting air of Washington? I do not know whether the political atmosphere of this city is or is not corrupt. I cannot speak from experience, nor from much observation. Perhaps there is a corrupt state of the body politic here; I know nothing of it. If there is, it probably does not arise from stagnant waters. If the political pool be in commotion, I am inclined to believe it is disturbed more by visitants from abroad, who come here to wash in it for themselves, or as proxies for others, than from the peaceable, inoffensive inhabitants and residents of this District. If the air here be so impure, so corrupting, how long will it be inhaled by the judges? Not more than four months in the year; no longer than they remain here to discharge their judicial duties. And if the honorable member from Pennsylvania be correct in the supposition that very shortly the whole docket of the Supreme Court can be finished in two months, or two and a half months, that will be the period in which the noxious qualities of the air of this metropolis will be inhaled; for I cannot think that, when official duties will require so small a portion of the year to be spent in this place, it will ever become a permanent residence for any of them. I have never heard that any of the judges have, as yet, suffered from this cause, though “within the very vortex of Executive influence;” to them the air which they breathe is as pure as that of the country. But, can it be supposed that Executive patronage or influence can be brought to bear upon one occupying the high and elevated station of a judge of the Supreme Court? What motive, what good thing, can be presented to induce a judge of that court to depart from the high road of official duty? Can he be tempted by the offer of any office in the gift of the Executive? He already holds one more honorable (if a comparison may be admitted between offices all honorable) than any which is within the gift even of the people, with the exception of that of the President of the United States. Can the power of the Executive be brought to exert its influence upon him? The tenure of his office is that of good behavior. He is elevated above the frowns and the flatteries of Executive authority and influence. What danger, then, exists that he will be corrupted? If, however, any such danger should be apprehended, it is easily avoided. Provide by law that the terms of the court shall be held in Maryland or Virginia, forty miles east or west from this capitol, and then the judges will breathe the pure air of the country only. The winds will not carry the noxious vapors which float in the atmosphere here such a distance.

The Judiciary Bill.

[H. of R.]

The honorable member from Pennsylvania added one more objection to any system which should detach the judges from the circuits. He feared it would seriously impair the ability of the judges to perform their duties; that they would gradually become less and less fit to decide upon the ever-varying codes of the different States; be less acquainted with, and at length nearly lose all recollection of, the peculiar local laws of the States; that, by being withdrawn from the active duties of the circuits, motives to exertion would cease; the judges would become less industrious, the judgment lose its vigor; for, as he remarked, exercise is required to preserve it, and the judge who decides the most causes is likely to decide them best.

To that part of this objection which has reference to that thorough knowledge of the local laws of each State which the judges should possess, and which supposes that it can be obtained and preserved only by the performance of circuit duties, several answers may be given.

If it be well founded, it proves too much, for then there would be no necessity of allowing an appeal to the Supreme Court, in any case depending upon the construction of local laws. The judge at the circuit would, if the principle involved in the objection be extended, decide it, not only there, but in the appellate court. If his knowledge of these laws is necessary to aid him in the discharge of his appellate duties, his brethren on the bench will need the same knowledge. And if it is to be obtained only at the circuit, it is then to be communicated to the other judges, which will supersede an examination in such cases by them; and thus the decisions will be made to rest on the opinion of a single judge. In my opinion there is no necessity for a judge to hold a circuit court, to enable him to become acquainted with the local laws and the different codes of the different States. How is a knowledge of them obtained? From the statute books, the books of reports, the treatises of learned men, the discussions at the bar. Are not all these within the reach of the judges of the Supreme Court here? Have they not the benefit of all these sources of information while sitting in this city? Are not members of the profession called to discuss questions of local law before the Supreme Court? Have we not seen distinguished members of Congress discharging their professional duties since we have been here? And is there any danger that they will not have such respect to their own characters, and the importance of the trust reposed in them, as will induce them to furnish the court with all the means necessary to enable it to pronounce a correct judgment? Must the judges attend at the circuits to obtain the benefits of the arguments of counsel, to know the contents of a statute book, a book of reports, or the treatise of a jurist? Will not a judge, whose learning and talents entitle him to a seat on the bench of that court, be able to apply his knowledge of principles to the construction of local laws? Will he cease to feel a due respect for the station he fills, for the rights of parties submitted to his decision, to the oath which he has taken to discharge his duties faithfully and to the best of his ability, the regard due to his own reputation? Will he forget all these when he is withdrawn from the circuit? Examine the reports of adjudicated cases in the Supreme Court. Is there to be found in them any want of knowledge of local laws by any one of the judges, though he may never have held a circuit court in the State where such laws are the basis of the decision which he pronounces?

There remains to be considered that part of the last objection urged by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, which is founded on the supposed necessity of performing circuit duties to obtain and preserve that vigor of judgment which is indispensable to a faithful discharge of the duties of a judge in the appellate tribunal. And I am not disposed to affirm that this objection is altogether groundless. Candor requires the admission that it is not without force; but I think its importance has been overrated, and that it is, perhaps, counterbalanced by the evils which may follow from the union of circuit and appellate duties.

What are the characteristics of a really useful judge? Integrity, legal learning, and what is sometimes called plain, practical, common sense; that knowledge of human nature, of men and things, which is obtained by an intercourse with the world. Technical learning is not all which is necessary. It may be too refined, too metaphysical, (if the expression may be allowed with reference to this subject,) sound common sense must be added to it; both united make a learned and a practical judge. How is the requisite legal knowledge obtained? By study, reflection, arguments of counsel. From what source is the knowledge of men and things obtained? By reading, observation, and intercourse with the world. Does it require the aid of a circuit court system to obtain this knowledge? Is not the present chief justice as competent to discharge his judicial duties, as though the docket of the circuit court which he holds required much active employment to dispose of it? Does not his closet witness his devotion to the study of legal science? And has he not daily intercourse with his friends and neighbors? And does he not furnish a living example of a learned as well as useful judge, without the aid derived from much active duty at the circuit? The duties of a nisi prius judge do not admit of much elaborate examination. Questions of law are of necessity decided oftentimes without time for deliberate reflection. The judge of such a court should be quick of apprehension, but he obtains there no great expansion of mind. It is not a school to furnish even the elements which constitute the essential characteristics of a judge of the highest judicial tribunal of this nation.

I might add that those who are appointed to this high office, are, and will be, ordinarily, if not always, taken from extensive practice at the bar; and who, therefore, come upon the bench with all the advantages of a long and uninterrupted exercise of the powers of the mind, employed on subjects connected with their new duties, and that there is little danger to apprehend that these advantages will be impaired or lost if they are separated from the circuits.

But is there no evil which attends the system which requires the performance of the circuit duties? Has the profession never seen nor heard of what is sometimes called pride of opinion? Are judges exempt from its operation? Do they not possess any portion of that nature which is common to the species? Are they not men? And is there no danger that this pride of opinion will be carried from the circuit to the appellate tribunal?

I need not reply to the suggestion that a separation from the circuits will cause the judges to be less industrious. The honorable member from Pennsylvania furnished it when he pointed out with so much ability the various and important duties which they were called to perform—the high and transcendent powers with which they were invested—the extended jurisdiction which they possessed—in cases involving principles of constitutional, statute, civil, common, admiralty and maritime, and equity law. With such duties imposed, and such jurisdiction and powers conferred on them, indolence can have no place. Constant application and untiring industry would continue to characterize, as it hitherto has done, the judges of the Supreme Court.

I have endeavored, as briefly as I could, to present the views which I entertain of the bill which has been offered to the consideration of the committee. I shall not trespass upon their patience by a recapitulation of them. My thanks are due for the indulgence which has been so liberally extended to me, for the kind attention and the patience with which the committee have listened to my crude and desultory remarks. I cannot, however, resume my seat, without once more invoking their attention to the paramount importance of this bill, connected, as it is, with the highest judicial tribunal of the nation. The tide of party prejudice and feeling, and of popular excitement, may roll in upon us like a flood. In its desolating course it may lay waste and destroy many of our valuable institutions. The baleful and corrupting influence of party spirit may enter other departments of the Government; but preserve inviolate the integrity, the independence, the sense of individual responsibility, the learning, of the Supreme Court, this ark of the political covenant, and the public confidence in it, and all will be well. The Government will be safe. These feelings of prejudice and party will subside. This popular excitement will cease. Impair or destroy these essential characteristics of this august tribunal, and all will be lost, irretrievably and for ever lost.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said: After the minute and protracted debate upon this bill, I cannot flatter myself that I shall be able to enlighten or interest the committee, by presenting my own views. Nor can it be necessary, after the able remarks of my colleague. I will solicit your attention only to some general remarks in opposition to this bill, and to some reasons which induce me to prefer another. I have the honor of serving on the honorable committee with whom this bill originated; but after the most mature consideration I have been able to bestow upon the subject, I have come to a different conclusion from the majority of the committee. I listened with pleasure to the able and lucid arguments of the honorable chairman [Mr. BUCHANAN] who opened this debate. He said, and in the best manner, all that can be said, and fully exhausted the subject, according to his view of it. Nevertheless, I am constrained to differ.

Permit me to remark, sir, that we ought always to approach the judicial power of our constitution with the utmost circumspection and jealous vigilance. Here, truly, lie our best hopes and expectations.

I prefer altogether the system of judicial organization presented to the Senate in the year 1819, and which, as I understand, received the almost unanimous concurrence of that body, viz. making the Supreme Court of the United States an appellate court, and creating circuit courts to be filled with other judges. This is the true system for this country, after all that has or can be said; and one which will ere long be established; and much sooner, too, I am apt to think, than some gentlemen imagine.

Sir, the bill upon your table is one of the deepest and highest interest to this country. Few can be more so. It will give character to the country. It will make our law. It is an act for life. There will be no escape from it. This day we are about to establish the judicial character of the Government for years to come, if not for ever. Many who now hear me will live long enough to see the fatal effects of this bill, should Congress be so unwise as to pass it into a law. I hardly dare to speak openly my apprehensions from the adoption of this bill—this accumulation of judges in the Supreme Court, to provide judges for the circuits. I hope the committee will pause, and pause a long while, before they take a step so ominous to the ultimate destiny of the country.

Permit me to say, sir, that in establishing or extending a judicial system for this country, we ought to aim at two things, uniformity and permanence. The system should be adapted to the wants of the country; it should, if possible, carry to every part of the Union an equal participation in the judicial power of the constitution, and be capable of extension, according to the growth and exigencies of this enterprising, active, and extending republic. It is a fatal objection to any system, that it is partial, or that it must be exchanged for another. A change of system is a change of law. It is a change of judges. It introduces endless and ruinous confusion; and that, too, where certainty and harmony should prevail. If we would have uniformity in the exposition of the law, we must have a uniform and permanent system in its administration. Let us now look after such a system. It may be found without difficulty. But let us avoid as a calamity this augmentation of judges in the Supreme Court, until it is broken down by its weight, and stripped of every thing which commends it to the people.

There are, essentially, but two plans brought before the committee by the bill or the amendments proposed; one is, to leave the Supreme Court as an appellate court, and create circuit judges for circuit court duties; and the other is, to enlarge the Supreme Court as far as it is necessary to have judges to ride the circuits; and, I suppose, to add occasionally a judge or two to the Supreme Bench, just as they may be wanted on new circuits. I ask the serious attention of gentlemen to the principle of these plans or systems. Any plan can be filled up in detail, if we can but settle upon it.

I shall not deny but that, as far as practicable, we are bound to give to every part of the country an equal participation in the judicial power of the constitution. The friends of this bill set out with this position; and I shall not deny its truth, though I shall show that even they do not act up to it; nor can they upon the system proposed in the bill: and herein is one of its defects. There is a system, however, which will carry into effect this principle; but it is not the system of this bill.

Every wise man will concede to me, that nothing should be done which is calculated to subvert the Supreme Court. Nothing should be attempted which will seriously jeopardize its existence. Whatever feelings may have existed, or may now exist, in any parts of the Union, in consequence of the views entertained by our judges of the powers of the constitution, or of determinations made by them, none will deny that the judicial power is one of the noblest and firmest pillars of our national fabric; and that when its supreme organ comes (if it ever shall) to want efficiency, we shall then have great cause to be solicitous for our dearest interests. I do not hesitate to declare that the judicial power of the constitution is the great regulator, the sheet anchor, the final hope of this Government. Who is not admonished of the inestimable importance of preserving to the court all its wisdom and efficiency, by the deep and diverse interests represented upon this floor of our national council, where conflicting sectional interests and claims are putting to the severest, if not fatal test, the very elements of our constitution?

I shall not stop here to pronounce a eulogium upon the distinguished men who now fill the court. My business is rather to preserve the court than to praise it, and to preserve it in that character and condition which itself constitutes the highest eulogy upon the judges who preside in it.

The first objection I have to urge against the system proposed in this bill is, that it is not even now adapted to the country, and must and will be finally abandoned. It is not uniform throughout the country now, and is becoming less so every year; while, at no very remote period, the whole will be given up for the circuit system. It is wanting in the two particulars which ought to be kept in view in establishing a judicial system. Most of the friends of this bill admit that the Supreme Court, with its seven judges, has come to its perfect and full maturity as a Supreme Court, and that they would not accumulate judges in it, but that they are wanted for the duties of the circuits. Sir, I conjure gentlemen to stop and consider what they are about doing—crowding judges into the court that holds the destinies of the country in its hands, that we may have the necessary circuit judges. And where will gentlemen stop? They add three now. It will be easier to add two, and then one hereafter, just according to the extension and growth of the country. We shall have a town meeting rather than a court. No, sir, we must stop where we are. If the Supreme Court is perfect, as it now is, let us leave it to fulfil its high destinies, and not tamper with it, until we rob it of public confidence, and are compelled to abandon it as tumultuous and inefficient. I will never consent to a measure of temporary relief which jeopardizes the structure of the judiciary. We are now called upon to choose the true system; nor need we delay one moment.

Let it be remembered that the judges of the Supreme Court hold an annual session at Washington of about twelve weeks. They need at least four weeks more, to come to and return from Washington. Will these men be able, by increasing their number, as is now proposed, to discharge their duties in the Supreme Court, and on the numerous circuits? Let us for a moment cast our eye over the people and extent of territory, for which it is said we ought, and must, and which we profess to attempt to provide with circuit courts. There is at present but one judge of this court in the Western States; and, as his circuit is to be altered, I will speak of the whole territory together. These are Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. We leave by this bill unprovided for the western districts of New York, Pennsylvania, Louisiana, and the eastern district of Alabama. The system, as it is, cannot be stretched so as to do these parts of the country justice. They must therefore wait until the eleventh and twelfth judges shall be added to the court. And let us not forget, that so great is the population in the three western districts of New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, that they have nearly as great a representation in this House as all the Western States; and that there are, at this time, more cases on the docket of the Supreme Court brought up from the western district of Virginia, than have been brought from the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, from the origin of the Government to the present time. There are likewise Florida, Arkansas, and Michigan, pressing on for admission into this Union; and what is to be done for them? The business in Florida is very considerable at present, and will soon be much greater. This whole territory, which I have thus enumerated, constitutes more than two-thirds of the United States. Are we from time to time to give them circuit judges who shall sit in the Supreme Court? The extent of travel and business forbids it. But let us look at the amount and character of the business of the Supreme Court at Washington, even as it now is; and should it increase, as it certainly will, there must be two terms of the Supreme court established. There are on the docket of that court one hundred and thirty cases. It does not ordinarily dispose of more than sixty each year, with a protracted and laborious session of ten or twelve weeks. The labors of the judges while on the bench of the Supreme Court are incessant and exhausting. They cannot possibly endure more. And are they to be denied all time and leisure for reading and study? Is there really any danger that they will become the victims of "indolence and sloth," as has been said repeatedly during this debate? What men on earth have more need of time to become qualified to discharge the responsible duties of the highest judicatory of this country? How vast, how overwhelming, is the jurisdiction of that court? The world has never seen the like. History does not inform us of any such. Consider what deep and intricate questions are weekly and daily discussed there, growing out of our national compact; out of State legislation; national law, commercial law; the numerous titles to real estate under the laws of the States; the great code of equity which prevails there. What consummate wisdom; what profound talents; what historical and diversified reading; what professional knowledge; what study, research, and deliberation, must they bring to their consultations? And then, what amount of responsibility lies upon their minds, while they are thus settling principles involving the character of the nation abroad, and of every portion of it at home. I declare, they are the last men to whom we should deny time. That jurisdiction, which in other countries is divided, is all placed in our Supreme Court; and without more time to devote to the business of that court, than they are likely to have should this bill pass to a law, the judges will not sustain themselves, nor finish business as it should be done in an appellate court, which convenes only once a year. Besides, sir, I should think that the noble ambition of the judges to answer the just expectations of the country, and sustain the high character they must have acquired to obtain the enviable seats they fill, are a sufficient guaranty that time will not be squandered by them.

I have thus far contended that the system proposed in this bill must and will be abandoned, and perhaps much sooner than we are aware of, if we attempt to impose upon the same men the duties of the Circuit and Supreme Courts.

The second objection I have to urge against this bill is, the accumulation of judges in the court.

I have no belief that the court can be made better by increasing the number of judges. Seven is enough, if not too many. I will not, on this part of the subject, detain the committee by examining minutely the reasons of the consequences which must inevitably follow incumbering the Supreme Court. I appeal to the observation and experience of all who hear me, for the truth of what I now say. The court will become unwieldy, dilatory, less uniform, less efficient; the judges will feel less personal responsibility, and they will often be divided in opinion. I beg gentlemen to weigh these considerations, and give them their due influence. Lord Mansfield, after he had been the chief justice of King's bench thirteen years, in giving his opinion in a case in which one of the judges differed from the other three, expressed his regret that the court were not united, and said that it was the first instance of a difference among the judges since he had been on the bench. What has been the effect of such unanimity in the English courts? The great commercial principles of that people have been settled once, for ever. Place nine or ten judges upon the King's bench, and what think you would be the unanimity or effect of its decisions. Is it not a subject of regret, that the appellate tribunals of the country so often present jarring opinions and discordant views, the result of a numerous bench? There cannot be ordinarily mature consultation where there is a multitude of judges. Where do the friends of this bill find any examples to sustain their views? I stop not to speak of the House of Lords, nor of the Senate of the State of New York. Neither of them, in point of judicial character, are worthy of imitation or praise. They are no more competent to decide questions of law, than is this House, in which there is as much judicial talent as in either of them. But I fear we should make a sorry figure with the abstruse and complicated principles which undergo an examination in the other part of this capitol. The highest courts of law and equity in England consist of from one to four judges. There are four on the King's bench, four in the common pleas, four in exchequer, one in the court of equity, and one in the court of admiralty. Who has not heard of the wisdom and the fame of her lord chancellors, whose jurisdiction and power are immense? Of the enlightened administration of her admiralty and other courts? What would be thought of a proposition in Parliament to encumber those courts with ten judges? And, sir, what do we find in our own country to recommend this bill? Massachusetts has but four judges, New York three, Pennsylvania five; and these are among the largest and most commercial States in the Union. The idea has been gaining ground in this country for a few years past, that our supreme judicatories should consist of a few, but able men.

Some have said that the Supreme Court should be enlarged for its own sake, in order that every part of the country may be represented. If by representation is meant that the sectional feelings of the country should be in the court, I protest against such a notion. Nothing but downright corruption would be worse. But if gentlemen mean only that the court should be possessed of local statutes and usages, so as to be fully possessed of whatever is material to the merits of cases, I agree with them. And I say they always have this from the record, which brings up from the circuit court every thing which pertains to the case, whether it be local or general. If this were not so, how could the judges, who do not try the case below, ever understand it above? Do they depend upon the judge who sat at the circuit, for the facts or law upon which they are to decide? Not at all. The whole case is on the record. Let the question be put to the judges, if they do not gain their knowledge from the record and argument of counsel, and I will most cheerfully abide the answer. Besides, if I am wrong, then each State wants a representative in the court. It cannot be contended that a judge, by holding a circuit court twelve days in a year, and often less, in a sister State, can acquire any local knowledge or practice which is peculiar, upon which he would venture to rely himself, or communicate to others.

The third objection I shall urge against the adoption of this bill, is, that an appellate court should not be composed of judges whose decision is to be reviewed, and, if necessary, reversed. Judges are but men, and they are subject to like passions and infirmities with them. There are but few judges who, after forming and publicly pronouncing an opinion below, can review it with entire impartiality above. I appeal to the observation and experience of every gentleman who hears me, if this is not so. Such perfection is not to be expected from imperfect man. There is a pride of opinion, as well as an ambition to be right, which, in spite of the efforts of the most upright mind, will influence it in reviewing its conclusions. I would not abandon a tried system for this defect only; for perhaps we cannot hit upon any system not obnoxious to objections; but it is a defect, and one often of a serious magnitude. It sometimes happens that the judge below gives the casting vote above. I have known this to happen in the State which I have the honor to represent, and yet the judges of that court are among the most distinguished and virtuous men who ever adorned any court. If it be necessary to have different grades of courts, that important questions may be thoroughly examined and re-examined, so that error shall not lurk in any hidden place, is it not equally necessary to fill those courts with different judges?

These are some of the considerations which induce me to oppose the passage of this bill. The system proposed is not adapted to this country, and is becoming less so every year. It is not, and cannot be uniform, and will speedily give way to the introduction of the better and true system. The Supreme Court will be loaded with judges, until it is broken down; when, alas, we shall find it too late to retrieve our affairs. I will not, after the extensive remarks of my honorable colleague, who has just taken his seat, detain the committee, to urge other objections to the bill.

I do not concur in one position laid down by my colleague, viz. that there is no necessity for doing any thing. I think something must be done. There is nothing like an equal participation of our judicial power, by the Western States, and some portions of the Eastern. We are bound to do something; the best we can. If we will not hear the complaints now, they will become uneasy; and we may be found to adopt, at last, a system under unpropitious circumstances.

The honorable chairman of the committee has told us that if we separate the judges from circuit duties, they will become the tools of corrupt influence in this capitol. He says, they will come to reside here, and will breathe the tainted atmosphere of Washington. This is altogether imaginary. The judges will not come to reside in Washington. Will it be believed that the judges now on the bench would, did they not ride on the circuit, leave those parts of the country where they have been born and educated; where live their friends and connexions; where they have established themselves in the affections of the public; have contracted family alliances, and perhaps made pecuniary investments—and come and live in this vortex of fashion, extravagance, and dissipation? Let the question be put to the judges severally, I will abide the answer of any one, or all of them. But what if they should establish themselves here? How are they to be tainted? The Executive, for the time being, is not ordinarily the person who has raised to the bench more than one or two of the judges. And how, if he be corrupt himself, (which I will never suppose of any man whom the people of this country select as their Chief Magistrate,) can he address the judges? What has he to present to seduce them? They hold, by an independent tenure for life, the best offices in the Government; with a salary equal to their utmost wishes. No, sir, if danger there be, it is on the other side; that these men will feel their independence too much, if it were possible. Nothing will gain independence and integrity to men, so much as a commission in the Supreme Court. There is not the most remote danger of surveillance there. I repeat it, the danger is rather on the other side.

It has further been said, that, if we do not send the judges out upon the circuits, the people will withdraw from them their confidence; they will know nothing of them but the “decrees issuing from their dark and vaulted chambers.” I was, indeed, sorry that the honorable gentleman who opened this debate, should have lent his name in any way to such an objection, and to those weak or wicked persons who talk of the “decrees,” and “dark and vaulted chambers from whence they issue.” Such things should not be said, or imagined. Like a division of the Union, we should reprobate the very mention of them. Sir, what is intended by this objection? That the judges of the court sit in secret, and fulminate their edicts, regardless of the vows which are upon them? Do they not sit in open day? in this capitol? before us, the representatives of all this nation? and the innumerable distinguished advocates and strangers who crowd their room to listen to their wisdom, and the thrilling eloquence there to be heard from week to week? Are there any secretaries there? any appalling “decrees?” “any dark and vaulted chambers?” The Supreme Court is the noblest and most august tribunal in the land; most worthy of the confidence and affection of the people. I am sorry to see such sly and hurtful insinuations. I acquit the honorable chairman of all opposition to the court himself. No man, I trust, more highly appreciates it, and few can do more to defend and sustain it. But the friends of the country must not forget that the judicial power is the palladium of the constitution; without which, it would not live a twelvemonth.

It is further said, that, if the judges are not sent on the circuit, they will lose their knowledge, their acuteness, and their habits of attention and business. There may be something in this objection, but much less than is supposed. Will the judges lose their professional knowledge while they are listening, for three months, to the most profound and erudite counsellors, on the most intricate and important subject? What learning, thought, research, and wisdom, do they need to bring to their deliberations? What will they forget? What do they not need to acquire? And is it really true, that, after having spent their lives in the practice and detail of the law, they must travel, and try cases on the circuit, to keep their faculties alive and efficient? Can it be necessary that these learned men should mix with all sorts of people to retain their knowledge, their tact, or their integrity? "To ride in coaches, wagons, solas, gigs, carryalls, or in steamboats, and ferry-boats, to receive the full benefit, in eating houses, taverns, boarding houses, and bar rooms, of the conversations of learned tapsters, stewards, and stage coach drivers?"

I have thus briefly, but I hope satisfactorily, considered the objections urged to a system which separates the duties of the circuit courts from the judges of the Supreme Court; they are more imaginary than real.

The amendment more immediately under the consideration of the committee proposes to abolish the present circuit courts, and divide the States into new circuits, and create a new circuit court to consist of the three contiguous district judges. I do not know that I should object to this system; although I fear that all the present district judges would not give satisfaction in this higher tribunal. They were not selected for it, nor are their salaries such as would command the first talents hereafter. This may not, however, be the fact. In the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I know it is not the fact. The district judge of that State is distinguished for his talents and professional attainments, and would do honor to the Supreme Court itself.

Sir, the subject before us involves the substantial interests and glory of this country. Let us pause, and consider well what we are doing. Let us approach the organ of judicial power with jealous vigilance and circumspection; lest unawares we strike from under us the pillar of our constitution, and the foundation of national existence.

Mr. BOULDIN, of Virginia, next took the floor, but yielded it for a motion to rise.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1830.

THE HORNET, SLOOP OF WAR.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the following bill, which was the special order of the day for this day:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the widows, if any such there be, and, in case there be no widow, the child or children; and, if there be no child, then the parent or parents; and, if there be no parent, then the brothers and sisters of the officers, seamen, and marines who were in the service of the United States, and lost in the United States' sloop of war Hornet, shall be entitled to, and receive, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to six months' pay of their respective deceased relatives, aforesaid, in addition to the pay due to the said deceased on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty, up to which day the arrears of pay due the deceased shall be allowed and paid by the accounting officers of the Navy Department."

On motion of Mr. DORSEY, the bill was amended so as to conform to the date of the supposed loss of the Hornet, (10th September.)

Mr. SPEIGHT, of North Carolina, was not opposed to the main object of the bill, as far as concerned the widows and children of the officers and crew of the Hornet; but he was opposed to going beyond that line, to their parents and brothers and sisters. This, he thought, was extending the principle further than was justifiable.

Mr. DORSEY spoke in support of the bill, showing it to be sustained by precedents in like cases, and especially in the case of the Eprevier, from the act passed in which case, with the exception of the name of the vessel, this bill had been literally copied. Mr. D. expatiated on the favor which the navy had won for itself in the glorious results of the late war, in which it had fought itself into the affections of the American people, under which influence the sort of provision proposed in this bill had become a part of the settled policy of the country. Of the well founded objections to the establishment of a pension system he was well aware. But they would not apply in any manner to this bill, which must be considered rather in the light of an expression of national sympathy, and of condolence with the bereaved, than in any other; for it could not enter into the mind of any man, that the provision contained in this bill was to be considered as any thing like a compensation for the afflicting bereavement sustained by the relatives of those who had thus unfortunately perished.

The motion of Mr. SPEIGHT was then decided in the negative; and the committee rose, and reported the bill; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

THE JUDICIARY.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill to extend the judiciary system.

Mr. BOULDIN, of Virginia, spoke at length in support of the bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, if my view of the question under discussion was the same with that of any gentleman who has addressed the committee, prudence would, perhaps, dictate that silence, and a careful consideration of the remarks of others, would best become my legislative inexperience. But some examination of the subject having produced a conviction on my own mind that it would be inexpedient to make any alteration in the judicial system of the United States, without the most urgent reasons, nay, without an absolute and imperious necessity, which would overrule all arguments resting in opinion merely, and that at present the contemplated change, or any change, is unnecessary, I feel constrained to say to the committee how and why I have reached these conclusions.

It will be conceded that the subject is one of extreme delicacy and difficulty. In all countries, it occupies the anxious thoughts of those who are charged with the public interests. When, therefore, a plan has been happily laid in our own land, which, in its execution, commands the public confidence, and so ensures obedience to its decrees, will prudence, will the careful watchfulness that belongs to our stations, allow us to leave the road we have found so smooth, and fragrant from the flowers that bloomed upon its sides, and to enter upon an unbeaten way that may lead us into mire and swampy grounds? This tribunal, like every constituted authority of these United States, finds its strongest, its enduring foundation in the belief that it is enlightened and of the purest integrity—it is armed with power to enforce its mandates, but its best authority is the regard I have mentioned; and, if it shall ever happen that a different estimate will be made of its decisions from that which now prevails, it and our other institutions will soon sink together.

Let us not then put to hazard this rich fruit of our noble form of government—it has all the raciness of the soil on which it grew, and all the mellowness that the brightest and strongest intellectual rays, steadily beaming upon it, could produce. The Supreme Court is ripe in its fame and in its usefulness—it will never be greater than it is. I beseech the committee to take no step that may, by possibility, relax its present hold upon public esteem, founded on the best and strongest reasons. The Supreme Court is known as it is now constituted—as such, it is regarded to be wise, learned, and honest. It should not be lightly changed—it should be looked on as so far permanent, that while the individuals enjoying its honors come and go, the system remains the same, at least so long as it may be found to answer the end designated at its formation—make it not, by an augmentation of its members, less responsible, or less effective.

I do not like an increase of the judges for many other reasons; among the most important of which is the consideration that it will have a tendency to destroy the confederate character of the court. This was deemed a most material quality by those who framed the constitution; for we find that, by the law of 1789, in enacting which many of those who were in the constitution-convention took a part, the judges of the Supreme Court were appointed indifferently from every quarter of the country, and were strictly circuit judges, that is, itinerant, and holding courts as might be arranged by themselves—indeed, I think the act contemplated alteration. The reasons for my preference of this plan I will submit hereafter; at present I wish to contrast it with the representative system—representative not, says my honorable colleague and friend, [Mr. BUCHANAN] of local partialities, sectional feelings, and interests, but of local intelligence. Sir, the purpose is fair; but if the end be obtained, it will not be obtained singly. The book of human nature tells us on every page that man, how pure soever his integrity, however clear and strong his mental endowment, how elevated soever his station or responsible his duties, if we except some rare beings, whom surpassing excellence (if it may be said without irreverence) brings into some slight resemblance to Divinity, is imbued with the prejudices and passions and frailties of his abode. If from every part of this wide empire you bring a judge, or make it an indispensable official qualification that he shall reside within designated limits, he will carry with him into court all the peculiarities, not only of character and learning, which are desirable, but of jealousy and feeling, that naturally arise out of State pride and State doctrine. Need I go out of this hall for the truth of what I assert? Every gentleman on this floor is, I doubt not, as pure as any judge—on many points as learned—perhaps on all as wise—each no doubt acts upon his own convictions; and yet is it not easily perceived that we come from different quarters? We have, as we ought to have, representation in its best shape in this House—we have it in another aspect in the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature—but the court of the last resort should be the court of the nation; and, in making these remarks, I trust it will not be supposed that I am for consolidation—far from it; but I am in favor of a court which, perched, as the Supreme Court is, upon a lofty eminence, shall be surrounded by the country's honor and confidence, and leave far below the passions and feelings which would push it from this elevated point.

The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee has referred to the consideration of economy. It is well worthy of attention. I mean that liberal economy which leads, in public and private affairs, to the best consequences—a principle that, while it freely appropriates or expends money where a correspondent benefit may be reasonably calculated on, steadfastly refuses the application of its means to any purpose that does not promise an adequate return. He spoke of it as furnishing a good reason for preferring his bill to the circuit court system, which some honorable gentlemen advocate; but, as I do not intend to recommend either the one or the other to the adoption of the committee, regard to proper economy comes to me in aid of other considerations, for retaining the present judges without addition, under certain modifications of their duties.

But the reason which, in my judgment, is decisive, is, that the proposed change is not necessary. How? Has not a different idea prevailed for years past? Was not a bill very much, if not altogether, like the one under consideration, reported four sessions since, and debated at length, and yet this opinion not advocated—nor has it now been brought into view? True—and perhaps temerity may be thought to mark my conduct, while I attempt to show the committee that the ground I have taken is one upon which I can stand.

The business of England, multifarious as it is, and various as it must be, from the complexity of her extended commercial pursuits—from her manufacturing and agricultural transactions, and the varied intercourse of a large and very dense population, is done, and well done, by fewer judges than we have now; if you embrace your Supreme Court and all the district judges, by fewer than one-half, exclusive of our State judicial magistrates—amounting to some hundreds, many of them possessing the deepest learning, and the most enviable reputations for talents and probity. The fact is they labor more; an English judge will go into court in the morning, and, instead of returning home to dine, will, perhaps, in a press of business, eat a few mouthfuls on the bench to sustain him. Our State judges devote a much larger share of time to judicial duty, than is done in the United States' courts. In Pennsylvania not less than nine, perhaps ten, months are employed annually and assiduously in public business, by her Supreme Court judges. Great labor, greater responsibility, and an abstraction from social pleasures and domestic joys, are the price that every kind of distinction costs. Look at your Chief Magistracy; it is the highest office in the world—desired by many—attained by few—and rarely by those who desire it most; although the distinguished individuals who have filled it, the illustrious man who now graces it, and those who shall hereafter occupy it, are and will be identified with our country; will live in her history, and be regarded as the most fortunate of men; yet I do not hesitate to say, that however fortunate it may have been, or will be, for the country, that some of them have reached, or may hereafter reach, her highest honors, to themselves it brought no happiness—that it never will bring any in the discharge of its duties: the highest rewards may soothe their retirement; the good opinion and gratitude of their fellow-citizens, and the consciousness of having performed well the highest duties, will belong to such as deserve them, when they have ceased to be public functionaries—but while they direct or shape the destinies of the country, they must look for labor and anxiety without cessation or stint. Shall the most elevated judicial stations be exempt from the common rule? Shall citizens ascend the political ladder, and not be measured by the scale which regulates responsibility and toil, and which assigns an increased portion of both to increased dignity and honor? By no means. What is your plan? Simply to model the circuits so as to spread them over a greater surface, and to require of the judges the discharge of extended duty. Show us, I think I hear gentlemen say, that the required duties can be performed, on any reasonable modification of them, by the present judges, and we will yield. I do think that the present circuits, although greatly enlarged so as to be co-extensive with the provisions of the bill, may be so modified that seven judges can discharge the duties readily and with ease. I hold in my hand a statement from the Treasury Department, showing the exact number of days that each United States' circuit court has been in session in the years 1827, 1828. That gentlemen may give to this document its due weight, I beg leave to state that, by the fourth section of the act of Congress of 8th May, 1792, there shall be paid to the marshal of each district, the compensations to the jurors, to the clerks of the district and circuit courts for their attendance, &c., to the attorney for his attendance, &c., to the marshal for his attendance at court, &c., which, with many other charges, must be included in an account to be drawn out by the marshal, and the same having been examined and certified by the court, or one of the judges of it, in which the services shall have been rendered, shall be passed in the usual manner at, and the amount thereof paid out of, the Treasury of the United States, &c. From these accounts, so settled and paid, the information I rely upon is compiled.

This paper, I presume, shows incontestibly how long these several courts were employed in each of the years mentioned. The accounts for 1829, I suppose, are not

One-half of which gives 48 days as the average of each year, equal to

Add for Supreme Court, 11

Total, 27 weeks.

To the fifth circuit,

1. Mississippi,
2. Eastern district of Louisiana,

No circuit court has been held in either of these States; but as the circuit is smaller by South Alabama than one of those created by the bill, no objection can be raised to it by the friends of that measure.

To the sixth circuit,

1. Kentucky,
2. Tennessee,

It is unnecessary to specify the number of days that would be required for this, or for the seventh and last circuit, as they are precisely the same with two proposed in the bill.

To the seventh circuit,

1. Ohio,
2. Indiana,
3. Illinois,
4. Missouri.

Will any gentleman hesitate to say that this modification is practicable? What do you require of any of the judges? To devote thirty-five weeks, at the most, out of fifty-two, to the discharge of his duties, leaving him seventeen weeks of leisure. Nor will the bill be aided by the allegation that the present judges cannot go through the duty; it would ill become me to say one syllable that could be tortured into the slightest disrespect to either of them; but this I will say, that reference to personal consideration of any kind is a bad ground of legislative action. It will not, I think, weaken my position, to allege, that, since the appointment of the seven judges was authorized, the last added, I believe, in 1807, the business has increased. I go upon the latest authentic evidence we have, and prove that the duty of the four first circuits may be gone through with ease—the fifth is smaller, and the sixth and seventh are the same with the circuits proposed to be established by the bill. Time sufficient is allowed for a session of the Supreme Court; for I have it from unquestionable authority, that the court expects to get through the docket this year, in a sitting of ordinary length—and that if they do not accomplish it now, they will, to a moral certainty, clear the list next term, of every cause that shall then be upon it. A term is of about two months' duration; for this service I have allotted eleven weeks, and, in so doing, have been unnecessarily liberal. All, therefore, that it was incumbent on me to prove, is, in my judgment, shown.

It may be objected that the system will not be uniform; that district courts will still exist. This objection, if it be one, is not removed by the bill proposed, or any of its amendments, which leave the district courts precisely as I propose to do. The complaints are chiefly from Tennessee and Kentucky; give them a judge—this, too, is the plan I submit, as well as that of the bill. Seven judges may do the business, and, if they can do it now, they can transact it until the green grass shall wave over every ear that hears me; for the honorable chairman said nine judges could do the business for a long time; and I presume the remark is equally true of seven, if they can now go through it with ease.

How would you assign the judges to the several circuits? I would repeal so much of the law as requires a judge to reside in a particular circuit, and authorize the bench to arrange, according to convenience, as to the individual who shall go into this or that circuit. This would interfere with what some gentlemen seem to think an advantage, the residence of the judge in his circuit. In support of such residence there are great names, among them the former chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House, now a distinguished member of the other branch of the Legislature, [Mr. WEBSTER.] The present committee, by the bill under discussion, show they are of the same opinion; but the law, for the first thirteen years of the Government, was against it; and to me the idea appears to be fallacious. The judges had better not sit upon the causes of their companions and friends, the festivities they participate, and the hospitalities extended to them—the every day intercourse of fixed residence is, to my mind, a disqualification, rather than a requirement I would insist on. I mean not, sir, that they should not mingle with their fellow-citizens; on the contrary, I think they should leave the judge on the bench, and associate freely with those whom habits, inclination, and circumstances have thrown into the same association; but, in my view, they should not reside where they decree judgment. In every community dissensions arise; conflicts grow out of all the incidents of life—not to speak of meaner causes, pride—political aspirations—honest emulation for fame, and the ennobling rivalry of talents, all bring their contributions to the creation of divisions among men and in society. From these, and the distinctions they create, and the motives from which they spring, separate, as far and as wide as you can, those who are to decide what belongs to you, and what is mine—who are bound to determine whether A B shall die, or B C shall suffer more by disgrace and imprisonment. To this end, I know of no means so effectual as to send a judge from his residence. An opportunity will be thus afforded to each judge to acquire a knowledge of the laws of every State by actual observation and practice, which is better than that each, by a fixed place of duty, should be familiar with the local laws of his own particular circuit only. Nor will such an arrangement obstruct, but facilitate, the operation so much desired, of personal intercourse between the highest judicial functionaries and the citizens of the country.

There will be, for this purpose, the double advantage of home association, and the commingling which must follow the discharge of their duties abroad—and this is a recommendation of the idea I have suggested, for I fully concur in the estimate which is made of the value of favorable public opinion; I mean opinion founded on the esteem which good principles and good actions always produce in public and private life. No man ever served his country with all the advantage of which he was capable, who did not enjoy the regard, or, what is the same thing, the well founded confidence of those for whom he acted; and to give the greatest efficacy to the best endeavors, the affections of those upon whom authority operates, will be found eminently useful. The distinguished head of the Supreme Court, for instance, might command your respect by his transcendent talents; would secure your admiration by the most upright and able discharge of the most exalted duties; but it would be only (if his reputation speaks correctly of him, for I have not the happiness of his personal acquaintance) because singleness of heart and the frankness of youth pervade all his actions, that you would feel for him a stronger and a warmer emotion. It is to these happy qualities that he is indebted for the high personal regard which attaches to him, wherever he is known, more than to the performance of his great duties at Richmond, for his richest fame has been furnished by his labors at Washington.

The confidence which the nation feels in this tribunal, and those who constitute it, is owing, in part, to their discharge of circuit court duties, the advantages of which I fully appreciate, and concur in many of the views in relation thereto, taken by my colleague, [Mr. BUCHANAN] but I should hope a higher and better principle than personal regard lay at the bottom of the almost reverence with which its decisions are received; that the great element of the permanency of our Government, a determination on the part of the governed to submit to the constituted authorities, so long as they moved in their proper orbits, produced the acquiescence in opinions formed in uprightness, and delivered with ability. I conceive that this tribunal was never shaken by party tempests, nor moved by the storms which, while they agitated, served to purify our political atmosphere, because the constitution had ordained that its decisions should be final—because lengthened official existence had been given to its functionaries, and because it was, by the league, made unchangeable, unless crime or death interposed.

It will continue to be respected and confided in, when those who, now exercising the highest judicial powers the world knows in the most dignified stations, are nevertheless themselves more dignified, and giving back to the bench a lustre greater than that which it shed upon them, shall be remembered among those who have been our benefactors.

Mr. STRONG said, he did not mean to enter again at any great length into the debate, especially at this late hour in the afternoon. But, sir, as I have modified, so as to change the essential features of the amendment, which I originally offered to the bill, I feel it due to myself as well as to the committee, to submit a few remarks before the vote is taken.

The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. BUCHANAN] who has just taken his seat, asks whether you will deprive fifteen States of the advantages of the present circuit court system, in order to benefit the nine remaining States to which the circuit court system has not been extended? I answer yes, if thereby you can ensure an equality of rights and benefits to all the States in the Union.

On a former day, I endeavored to prove that there was no necessity for increasing the number of justices upon the bench of the Supreme Court—that the appropriate business of that court did not require it; and that, if the number was increased, the increase would be for the purpose, as the chairman of the committee acknowledged, of performing circuit court duties, which I attempted to show could be performed as well as others; and my opinion is still unchanged, though it may be wrong, that the danger of adding more judges to the Supreme Court is infinitely greater than the benefits which the old States derive from the present circuit court system over the system that I propose.

One reason, which has been strongly urged, why the circuit court system should be extended to the nine States is, that in these States a single federal judge decides upon the life and property of the citizen; and that from his decision, in criminal causes, there is no appeal; nor, in civil causes, except where the amount in controversy exceeds the sum of two thousand dollars; of this, however, these States have not complained.

Now the plan I propose removes this objection, if it be one, leaves the Supreme Court as it now is, and places all the States upon an entire equality. What is it? Let us look at it. We have twenty-seven district court judges. Now my amendment proposes to abolish the present circuit courts, and to divide the United States into nine circuits, as follows: The first to consist of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont; the second, of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut; the third, of New York and New Jersey; the fourth, of Pennsylvania and Delaware; the fifth, of Maryland and Virginia; the sixth, of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia; the seventh, of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana; the eighth, of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri; and the ninth, of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois: and, as each of these circuits has three district court judges, that these judges shall hold circuit courts therein, having the same powers and jurisdiction as the present circuit courts now have. These circuits may be made larger or smaller as occasion may require, but never comprehending less than three districts, with a judge in each, so that there may be a circuit court in each circuit, consisting always of three judges. This at once obviates the objection, that important civil and criminal cases, under the present judicial system, are tried by a single judge, whose decision is final; because it will be at once seen, that, by the plan I propose, as the court must consist of three, so no decision can be pronounced without the concurrence of at least two of them. The additional security which this gives to the citizen is certainly worthy of serious consideration. By this arrangement, too, the integrity and efficiency of the Supreme Court will be preserved; and, by having one annual term of the court at the city of Washington, and another at Cincinnati, and a third at Philadelphia or New York, the public would be better accommodated than they now are, and the justices themselves have ample employment, and frequent and intimate intercourse with the people.

This subject, I am aware, has nearly exhausted the patience of the committee; but I cannot sit down without a few words in reply to a singular objection which has been started. The honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. BOURDIN] who has just now taken his seat, says, that it will not do to separate the justices of the Supreme Court from the performance of circuit court duties, and commit the performance of these high duties to the district court judges, because they have the local feelings and prejudices of the judges of the State courts. The argument is, that these district judges reside permanently within the circuit; that they necessarily partake of the common feelings and prejudices of the people around them; therefore, they are not to be trusted with the decision of federal causes. But most of the justices of the Supreme Court now reside within their respective circuits. One of them is fixed there by law; and it is partly the object of the bill before the committee to oblige each to reside in his own circuit. Does not the honorable member, therefore, perceive that this argument is against himself? Does he not perceive that it applies with greater truth and force to his plan, than to mine? to one judge, than to three? Besides, if there be any force in the objection, it rather goes to prove that the justices of the Supreme Court ought to be separated from their circuit court duties, and some other plan adopted for the distribution and administration of justice, than that the present system should be persisted in. And why should the security or usefulness of the Supreme Court be at all hazarded? The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, himself, admits that seven justices are enough for the appropriate duties of that court. More, therefore, would obviously lessen rather than enlarge its responsibility and action, and enlarge rather than lessen its assumption and exercise of doubtful powers.

Sir, I have no particular partiality for my amendment. All things considered, I am inclined to think it better than any other which has been proposed. I doubt whether the time has come, when the system ought to be changed. And no adequate necessity has been shown for extending it. My only desire is that the bill may not pass. I will no longer trespass upon the patience of the committee, but submit the question for their decision, in the belief that if my amendment is rejected, it will be upon the conviction that no legislation at this time is necessary.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. STRONG, as modified by himself, and decided in the negative; and then, on the motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, the committee rose.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1830.

COURTS MARTIAL IN THE ARMY.

Mr. DRAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, which was instructed on the 15th instant "to inquire into the expediency of so amending the rules and articles of war, as to provide that when an officer commanding in chief of the army of the United States, or any separate corps thereof, shall be the accuser and prosecutor of any officer under his command, the detail of the court martial for the trial of such officer shall be made by the President of the United States, and the decision of the court referred directly to him," reported a bill to alter and amend the sixty-fifth article of the first section of an act entitled "An act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States," passed 10th April, 1806.

Mr. DRAYTON said that the object of this bill was to remedy an evil which now existed under the military system of the United States. By the sixty-fifth of the rules and articles of war, any general officer commanding an army, or colonel of a department, may appoint general courts martial whenever necessary. The proceedings of these courts are to be laid before the general or colonel, ordering them, for his confirmation or rejection, excepting that when the sentence extends to the loss of life, or the dismissal of a commissioned officer, it shall not be carried into execution without the sanction of the President of the United States. It may occur that the general or colonel ordering the court is himself the accuser and prosecutor, when it would be obviously inconsistent with the common principles of justice, that the members of a court who are to sit in judgment upon the accused should be detailed by an individual interested in the event of the trial, and who, under the influence of that feeling, might select officers hostile to the party accused, or peculiarly attached to himself. To guard against the possibility of such results, this bill has been reported. As it fully expresses the purposes for which it was framed, it is unnecessary for me to trouble the House with any further remarks to enforce its expediency.

The bill was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

THE HORNET.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the widows and orphans of the officers, seamen, and marines of the sloop of war Hornet," was read the third time; and the question was stated, Shall the bill pass? when

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Virginia, said he could not vote for this bill if the words brothers and sisters were retained. When a man fell in the service of his country, he had no objection to make a reasonable provision for his wife and children, if he had such; but to extend it further, was a dangerous precedent. He felt no hesitation in saying he could not and would not sustain it. If we could make donations—to the relations of officers who have perished in the service of their country, to brothers and sisters, where, and at what point, shall we stop? Have we entered into an agreement to provide for all the relations of our officers now in service, in case of their deaths? If such engagement has been entered into, I hope it will be produced. The system of pensions, sinecures, and donations, name it as you please, is a dangerous system; it has been sustained in most countries where it is now permanently enthroned, by passionate appeals to the liberality—the generosity of the people. Those appeals have also been too successful—they have produced bitter fruits.

In the Old World palaces have been built, estates purchased for distinguished individuals—with money drawn by a rigorous and cruel and oppressive taxation, from the poorest classes of the community; I say the poorest classes of the community, for while many fatten upon taxation, there are in all countries those who feel its burdens only. I do not like the term generosity. We have no right to be generous and charitable with the money of other people. We may give pensions to the widows and children of those who perish in the service of the country; for we have every reason to believe that they have thereby been deprived of the means of support; go beyond this in your pensioning system, and you are in great danger. The isthmus which separates acts that are generous from those that are venal, is very narrow, and we must be cautious, or we may pass it, and be involved in all the consequences that an overgrown system of pensioning has brought about in some of the more ancient nations of the earth. Our system has gone nearly as far as that of Great Britain, except that as yet we have no civil pensions. Let in civil pensions, and then you have the British plan—a system that has entailed an enormous debt on that nation, subjected their people to the horrors of heavy taxation, and reduced a large portion of their population (if their own writers are to be believed) to penury. Such have been the effects of pensions, sinecures, and donations indulged in by another country. When you have equalled them in the extent of your pensioning system, you may witness here what is witnessed there, for nature is not the partisan of a cis or a trans-atlantic world. My alarm is the greater, because no one pretends to know any thing of the condition of the brothers and sisters of the deceased officers. Those who support this bill assume (I suppose) they are poor. I may assume that the officers of the army and navy are most generally related to the wealthiest men in the community. Let no one suppose he venerates the glory of the navy more than I do. I esteem the navy most highly. My willingness to provide, for a reasonable time, for the wives and children of the officers and seamen who have perished in the service of the country, is proof of this disposition to the cause of the navy. The amount that is depending on this question is not of very great consequence. But it is a question of principle, and that makes it all-important. It is a great and memorable principle, that will fix hereafter, if settled as in the bill contained, the expenditure of millions. That is what constitutes its importance. I enter against the passage of this bill my protest. I will detain you no longer.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays upon the question of the passage of the bill; and the call being sustained by a sufficient number, they were accordingly ordered.

Mr. TEST moved the recommitment of the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to strike out that part of it granting the gratuity proposed by the bill to the brothers and sisters of the sufferers.

Mr. DORSEY said, the duty of reporting the bill now under discussion having been assigned me by the Committee on Naval Affairs, it will be expected, however reluctant I am to mingle in the discussions of this House, that I shall state the principles involved in it, and reply to the objections which have been presented to this committee in opposition to its adoption.

The committee, before they reported the bill, deemed it their duty to search into the practice of the Government, in making provision for the crews of national vessels lost at sea. It has pleased Divine Providence that the number of those should be but few. The first that occurred was that of the frigate Insurgent, captured from the republic of France by the gallant Truxton; the second, that of the brigantine Pickering—they both foundered at sea, in the same destroying gale. In April, 1802, Congress voted four months' additional pay to be paid to the widows of the officers, seamen, and marines who perished on board of those vessels, and if no widow, then the gratuity to be distributed among the children. The next like visitation of Providence fell on the sloop of war Wasp, commanded by the lamented Blakely. Congress were called to legislate on the subject, and a more expanded principle of distribution was then adopted. By the act of April, 1816, twelve months' pay was ordered to be distributed, one-third to the widow, and two-thirds to the children; if no child, then all to the widow; if no widow nor child, then to the parent; if no parent, then to the brothers and sisters of the officers, seamen, and marines. The Epervier and her crew, commanded by the gallant Shubrick, soon thereafter met the same untimely fate; and Congress, at the next session, provided for the distribution of six months' extra pay—first to the widow; if no widow, to the child; if no child, to the parents; if no parent, then to the brothers and sisters.

Thus Congress adhered to the diffusive principle contained in the bill now before this committee, while the mother was preferred to the child, and had all the gratuity of the Government given to her, the restricted principle, adopted in the case of the Insurgent and Pickering, confining the donative to the widow and the children, was rejected. The Committee on Naval Affairs deemed it inexpedient to disturb the question, and felt disposed to adopt the matured and settled policy of the national legislation, in connexion with this subject: they therefore have reported this bill—a copy of that adopted in the case of the Epervier. A motion is now made to strike out the contingent provision for the brothers and sisters, on the ground that it is extending the bounty of the Government to collateral relations, and that it ought not to be the policy of this Government to extend the principle of the pension system, alleged to be dangerous and corrupting.

Although, if it were a new question, for the first time suggested for our action, much might be said on both sides, I now deem it unnecessary to enter into the minute considerations which may have influenced our predecessors to depart from the precedents of 1804, and recognise the enlarged policy on which the acts of 1816 and '17 are predicated. This difference of legislation may be traced, in part, to the more enlarged views of the nation as connected with our navy.

In the infancy of our Government, this arm of our national defence was looked on with a most distrustful and jealous eye by a large portion of the politicians of this country; great exertions were made to cripple its progress, and appropriations for its increase were resisted with great pertinacity. It was deemed by some to be only advocated as a means of enlarging the Executive patronage, by others as improvident, because, in the infancy of our Government, and in the weakness of our resources, we were incompetent to contend with the naval Powers of Europe, and that every ship that we sent to sea was inevitably doomed to swell the number of our enemies' ships. During the triumph of these doctrines, an appropriation was asked for the relatives of those who perished in the Insurgent and Pickering. Its restricted appropriation, as to amount and objects, displays the then apathetic indifference to the cause of the navy. But another state of national feeling controlled the legislation of 1816 and '17. The navy then had not only conquered its foreign foes, but had achieved a victory over its domestic enemies. Every citizen participated in the glory of our naval battles; every manifestation of national respect evinced the national gratitude to those who gained for themselves such imperishable glory, and added to the renown of our youthfulness, by splendid exhibitions of consummate naval skill, daring intrepidity, and distinguished humanity.

This evidence of a high national feeling and enthusiasm was not confined to the living only, or those who perished in the blaze and glory of battle. A provident policy, and grateful respect for the memory of our naval benefactors, gave rise to a more expanded system of national remembrance of those who found a watery grave, far from home, while offering the protection of our national flag to our wide spread commerce.

Shall we now abandon this policy, and thus admit that the course of our predecessors was unwise and dangerous, as tending to the expansion of our pension system? for surely there is nothing in the history of this gallant ship, and of her noble crew, that can justify the nation in withholding the like expression of national regret for their loss, and the same sympathy with the relatives of those who perished with this ship, as were expressed in the cases of other ill-fated vessels. Are we willing to add to their orphanage and bereavements another pang, by the invidious comparison of relative merits which will result from the adoption of this amendment? Are we willing so to legislate as to induce a belief that the Hornet and her crew have not the same claims on our country as the Wasp and Epervier, and their crew had?

The name of the Hornet will be as imperishable as the history of the last war. In her engagement (when under the command of the lamented Lawrence, who died too soon for the cause of his country, but not too soon for his own fame) with the Peacock, there was exhibited the most brilliant specimen of naval gunnery ever exhibited. In fifteen minutes the Peacock was so riddled that she sunk before her whole crew could be removed, and carried down with her three of the Hornet's men, engaged in the humane attempt to save the lives of the drowning enemy. An engagement which has coerced from the veriest foreign revilers of our naval skill the highest praise, and compelled them, on the floor of the British Parliament, to admit that the naval gunnery on board of the Hornet could not have been surpassed by the most cool and deliberate target firing.

However brilliant this achievement may have been, the distinguished humanity of the victors also added great lustre to our national character: for they so conducted themselves, that the grateful captives proclaimed to the world "that the courtesies and attention received from their hands caused them to forget that they were prisoners of war." The war on the ocean was terminated by a brilliant victory achieved by the Hornet, too, when commanded by the gallant Biddle, over the Penguin. Surely there is nothing, then, in the character of this ship that should make us unwilling to notice her loss in the same manner that the loss of national ships has been noticed. Is there any thing in the history of her gallant officer, Otho H. Norris, and his crew, that justifies a departure from the practice of the Government? No, sir; his life was devoted to his country, and marked by an untiring zeal, great nautical science, consummate personal bravery, and elevated patriotism. He was a native of Maryland, a son of a distinguished revolutionary patriot. At an early age he displayed a great fondness for a seafaring life. His parent yielded his assent, and gave him an education to fit him for such pursuits. He entered him in the merchant service, to instruct him in practical navigation. In 1809, he solicited and procured a midshipman's appointment, and was ordered to repair on board the Syren. At this time he was but fifteen years of age, yet, soon thereafter, so distinguished was he for his superior seamanship and exemplary conduct, that he was placed in the command of a gunboat at New Orleans. From that time, he was constantly in service, and sailed from Charleston in the Carolina, as her second officer, under Captain Hendley, to co-operate in the defence of New Orleans against the then anticipated invasion by the enemy. In all the labor, fatigue, and dangers of that interesting crisis, he was engaged. In the battle of the 23d December, when the execution of the guns of the Carolina contributed so essentially to discomfit the foe, he was among the most ardent and brave. When she was burnt by the hot balls of the enemy, he tendered his services to the commanding general to serve on shore, and, in the ever memorable battle of the 8th of January, he commanded battery No. 2, a twenty-four pounder, and contributed, by his skill and gallantry, to that glorious victory which on that day crowned the American arms, and the anniversary of which is celebrated by a grateful and admiring people of its authors, with every demonstration of national joy and gratitude. For his exertions on that day, he received the thanks of his general (now the President of the United States) in the following warm and cheering words: "Lieutenant Norris, who commanded a twenty-four pounder, displayed, during the several engagements, the utmost skill and courage, and merits the thanks of the country."

He [Captain Norris] was never inactive; he was almost continually in service. He was among those who encountered in vessels, (affording none but very slight comforts,) under the command of Commodore Porter, the diseases of the West Indies, while attempting to free the sea from the plunderings and massacres of savage pirates. It was rumored last August in Pensacola, that Mr. Poinsett, our minister to Mexico, had been assassinated. Captain Ridgely ordered Captain Norris to repair to the coast of Mexico, and give such security and protection to our citizens as such a lawless and unexpected event might require. He arrived at Tampico the latter part of August, at a period when the American interest required the countenance and protection of a national ship. It was at a moment when Barradas, a Spanish general, had made a descent upon Tampico, with a view to subjugate the Mexican province to the crown of Spain. Feeling power, and forgetting what was due to the American character, this general demanded from an American citizen money, and extorted it by force and personal violence. The American consul interposed, and asked restitution and indemnity. It was not listened to. At this period Captain Norris arrived at Tampico. The complaints of the American citizen reached his ear. Faithful to himself, and indignant at the insult offered to his countryman, he demanded restitution of the property forcibly taken, and an ample atonement for the personal insult. His demand was gratified. While thus remaining at Tampico, to afford further protection, it pleased high Heaven to visit that coast with the awful and terrific storm of the 10th September, and to involve in one common grave this gallant ship and her noble crew. Is there any thing in such a life, in such a service, and in such a death, as will justify this House in withholding the ordinary and customary reward, the indication of national respect and of national sympathy?

The principle of the bill has none of the objections offered to a pension system. As a precedent, it is not dangerous. The causes which give rise to legislation on this subject, have been but rare; they have sprung from the elements, from storms and tempests, from the visitation of God. Since the existence of the Government, we have had to mourn only few such losses. Let us, therefore, banish all fears that the precedent again to be sanctioned by this bill will or can act oppressively upon our national resources. It is not a pension; there is no annual drain on the treasury; it creates no privileged class in society, drawing their support from the revenue of the country, and thus producing a wretched spirit of dependance, disgraceful to the character of freemen, and enlarging the patronage of the Government. No, it is no more than an expression of sorrow and regret for those who have deserved well of their country, and perished in our service, whilst affording, by our flag, security to our citizens and our commerce. It is an expression of sympathy with the relatives of those who have thus perished; it is a slight offering, a slight one, indeed, to the relatives of faithful servants, to prevent the immediate and sudden distress incidental to those who have depended on them for the necessities of life, until some new pursuits can be entered into.

These, and these only, are the principles involved in this bill; and I trust that no departure from it shall manifest that the nation has not now the same remembrance of the navy, and does not cherish for it the same provident regard, as distinguished the Congress of 1816 and 1817.

Mr. STORRS said, that as the opposition to the bill appeared to be chiefly directed against that part of it which provided in some cases for the payment allowed to the brothers and sisters of the officers and seamen, he hoped it would not be recommitted for the purpose of striking out that provision. The bill follows, in that respect, others of a like character, framed on other similar occasions, and the principle seemed to him to be as fair and just as any part of it. I think [said Mr. S.] that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CLAIBORNE] is greatly mistaken in supposing that the officers of the navy, or their relations, are among the wealthiest part of the community. I believe that it would be found, in most cases, quite the reverse, if it could be accurately ascertained. Certainly it may be very safely said, that the officers themselves are generally very far from rich, if they are even independent. I am acquainted personally with very many of them, whose parents and sisters have been in a great degree dependant on them for the comforts of life. Now, the bill provides that, in distributing the small gratuity proposed by it to be offered to them as a public testimonial of our sense of their merit and public services, if it should so happen that the deceased has left no parent, widow, or child, it shall be paid to his surviving brothers and sisters. There were many of the ship's company of the Hornet who contributed to the support of their sisters as well as their parents; and if it should happen that, in any case, the mother had deceased, it would be an unkind, not to say a harsh restriction in the bill which should deprive her daughter of the trifling contribution to her comfort. The sister stands in about the same near relation to the party as the mother; and admitting her or her brothers to share in the distribution, the bill proceeds on the same principle which allows the mother to participate in it. In both cases, we assume what we know frequently exists, that the officer or sailor contributes from his pay to the support of his sisters or younger brothers, as well as his parents, and there is no reason for making any discrimination between them. It may, indeed, happen, that, in some few instances, the relations may be in circumstances calling for nothing like relief, or even honorary gratuity from the Government. This may be the case as to some of the officers. But as to the seamen, it is not probable that there is any such case; and if we were to deny the gratuity altogether, because there may possibly be some case not calling for it from us, we may do a very unkind act to many who are justly entitled to our favorable notice. The allowance is at most, in all cases, very small; and will hardly be an equivalent for the individual property which many of the officers and seamen may have had on board the ship. The brothers and sisters would have shared in that, if their relative had died on the cruise, in the same case in which they will share under the present bill. He hoped, therefore, that the bill would not be recommitted, or changed in its provisions in any respect.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD advocated the bill as it was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. He thought that the provision which it contained, granting the benefit of the donation to the mothers and sisters of those who had perished in the performance of the duty which they owed and had paid to their country, ought to meet with the sanction of the House, as it would most assuredly receive the approbation of the country. By that section of the Union to which he belonged, he felt himself authorized to say that it would be cordially approved. In illustration of this, he instanced the case of one of the unfortunate gentlemen who met with an untimely fate in the disastrous event which deprived the nation of the services of so many gallant and meritorious citizens. The person he alluded to was the son of the late Col. Forsyth, of North Carolina, who fell upon the field of glory in the defence of his country. The son went to reside in the State of Tennessee; but the Legislature of North Carolina, with a generosity which redounded to its credit, and which he, as a citizen of that State, felt pride in reverting to, provided for him. The youth was eager to sustain his father's well earned fame, by devoting himself to the service of his country; and he sought glory, not in the field, where that father's renown was acquired, but upon the ocean, in the depth of which himself and his associates were now buried. For himself, [said Mr. S.] he entirely concurred in the opinion expressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. STONAS] as to the propriety and justice of retaining that feature of the bill; and also as to the fact of many of our most deserving officers being the children of poor and indigent parents—a circumstance honorable to themselves, and gratifying to their families, and to all who can feel pleasure in witnessing the exaltation of merit. In relation to the individual whose name he had mentioned, he could not bring his mind to consent that the brothers and sisters of that young gentleman, the children of his amiable and respected mother, the children of his venerated father, should be deprived of the advantages which that clause of the bill might possibly afford to them. For his own part, he could not consent to leave unremembered and unhonored the memory of one whose name was connected, not only with his own State, but also with the glories of his country.

Mr. SPEIGHT remarked that he had said yesterday, and repeated again to-day, that he was opposed to the whole bill, and was opposed to it in principle. He believed he had as much sympathy for those who had been bereaved of their relatives by this great calamity of the loss of the Hornet, as any member on that floor; and when called in his individual capacity to administer to their wants from funds under his own personal control, he believed he would be as prompt to manifest it. But, he could not answer to his constituents, nor to his own conscience, the propriety of thus appropriating the public funds. As to the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DORSEY] who advocated the bill on the score of gratitude to the gallant crew of the Hornet, or the glorious achievements of that vessel, he would ask that gentleman, if this principle obtained, where his pension law would stop? It was perfectly analogous to the whole system of the pension law, which he had opposed on former occasions, and which he could not consent to have crammed down his throat; and he hoped his opposition to it would not be emblazoned before him as a political sin. He contended that Congress had no power thus to legislate away the public treasury, and that, too, to individuals who had actually performed no services to the country. Should he vote for this bill, his constituents would have a right to demand of him on what principle he did so. If they ask me [said Mr. S.] whether I inquired into the pecuniary circumstances of those individuals to whom I voted this money, my answer must be "no; it was on the broad principle of national gratitude." And will this be a satisfactory answer? Sir, I wonder the gentlemen did not carry their gratitude to its fullest extent; and in the next thirty generations of the relatives of the deceased, in their bountiful provisions. The gentleman asks if the House is prepared to reject this provision of the bill. I trust in God, sir, it is prepared for it. The oppressive system of taxation for the increase of the revenue, must and will be put down by those who feel its burden.

In conclusion, [said Mr. S.] he could not vote for the bill. It seemed that when gentlemen put their shoulders to the wheel on the subject of pensions, they were disposed, to use a vulgar phrase, to "go the whole hog;" and allow no bounds to restrain them. Mr. S. also alluded to the case referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD] of young Forsyth, who was educated at the expense of his own State, without appealing to the National Legislature for assistance.

Mr. TEST said, he felt it due to himself to state, after what had been observed, the reasons why he moved the recommitment of the bill. The policy of it, [said Mr. T.] the grounds of it are questionable. What [he asked] was the object of making such appropriations to those engaged in our land or naval service? The object is, that when they are about to enter upon scenes of danger, they may not be appalled by the helplessness of their families, should any thing occur to them by which they might be deprived of their protection and support to encourage them to meet the perils of their station bravely, by holding out the certainty of future support to their bereaved families. This is the true ground on which the pension list is bottomed. Does this case come fairly within the range of the principle stated? It is certainly very doubtful if it do. All who belonged to the Hornet were there by their own free will, and there were many who envied them the situations they held. Was it a war they were engaged in when they perished? No. Did they encounter any danger? No. There would be much stronger ground for the proposition, had this lamentable occurrence happened in time of war. But the bill, as it now stands, is wrong in principle. And I ask with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEAKER] if this principle is adopted, where is it to stop? It must go in infinitum. They did not encounter any extraordinary danger. Their loss was an act of Heaven—of the hand of God. There is nothing extraordinary connected with it, calculated to excite our sympathies, except the deplorable destruction of human life which might not have happened to any other vessel, either public or private; and it is evident that the places occupied by them might well have been desired by thousands. But how does the principle of the pension system apply to brothers and sisters? They are wholly unconnected with the service or its dangers. If, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] says, the brothers or sisters of any of these officers or men are poor, and their poverty is the consequence of this misfortune, I shall vote for them; but the sisters of some of them, for aught we know, may have husbands worth thousands of dollars.

Mr. T. denied that this principle had always been observed by this House; and, in corroboration of what he said, he instanced the case of the mother of Commodore Perry, whose claims for a pension were brought before Congress, under circumstances calculated to arouse all our sympathies. She was admitted to be poor at the time, and that she derived her sole support from her son; yet her claim was rejected. The principle now sought to be established would soon become general, and a dangerous precedent [he said] it would be. He did not view this case in the light in which pensions are ordinarily given, for he did not think it would hold out any encouragement for persons to enter into the land or naval service. It was a hard duty he had to perform in moving the recommitment of the bill; and if he were to be governed by the dictates of his feelings, he could not have done it; but his judgment pointed out to him what was his duty, and he was forced to pursue its dictate.

Mr. T. concluded, by stating that he did not wish to vote against the bill, notwithstanding the questionable character in which it comes before the House; but, as it stands, its claims are addressed much more to our sympathies than our justice.

Mr. HOFFMAN expressed his regret that a discussion on this subject should have taken place, and proceeded to explain and defend the objects and the principle of the bill. He said the naval service was promoted by grants of this kind, and he hoped that the House would not depart, in the present case, from a rule so long established, and recognised in the proceedings of this House in several instances. A departure from a system, so beneficial in its consequences to the naval service, would diminish the encouragement now held out to persons to enter it. He hoped the discussion would not be protracted, and that the bill would be suffered to pass.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said, the bill rested more upon a principle of duty, than of mere favor and gratitude. Are gentlemen prepared to say that the representatives of these unfortunate men are not, upon principles of justice, entitled to this small pittance? Upon the strictest construction, the representatives of the officers and crew of the Hornet may demand what they were earning up to the moment of their loss. And is not the claim materially the same for a short time after that event? May not their families most properly look to us for that little portion of their subsistence which they were anticipating, and need the more because of this melancholy disaster? Why do we allow pensions? It is upon a principle of duty and strict propriety. And such is the case here. Justice and true national policy imperiously demand we should pass this bill. It is the settled policy of the Government. And, sir, if a wife and children may ask, upon the principle of right, I see not why brothers and sisters may not. We owe this money to the representatives of these men. Let us not add distress upon affliction, by withholding a momentary relief.

Mr. EVERETT inquired what was the precise question before the House?

The SPEAKER stated the question to be on the motion to recommit, with instructions to strike out the clause extending relief to brothers and sisters, in default of nearer relations.

Such [said Mr. EVERETT] was my understanding of the state of the question, and it seems to me, therefore, not in order to discuss the general principle of the bill. It has been admitted that this bill was to pass, and the only objection taken to it, in committee, was to this extension of its provisions to brothers and sisters. This objection assumes that the officers, seamen, and marines of our public armed ships belong to that class of the community in which they are likely to have wealthy brothers and sisters; such as stand in no need of the gratuity provided by this bill. No one can suppose that this is the case with the petty officers, seamen, and marines, who are, of course, the most numerous class of those provided for; and, as far as they are concerned, the objection falls to the ground. The same, in general, may, no doubt, be said of the officers as a class. It is by no means true, generally speaking, (as the objection before us supposes,) that they are of an affluent class in society. But granting that they are, and that the objection taken is well founded, do not gentlemen see that it proves too much? It is urged that, by extending this gratuity to brothers and sisters, we extend it to some of the richest persons in the country. If this be so, cannot, and ought not, these rich persons support their parents, their nephews, and nieces? But it is granted that these last are entitled to the gratuity; although, in proportion as these unfortunate officers, lost in the Hornet, have left wealthy brothers and sisters, in the same proportion their widows, children, and parents have no need of the public gratuity. But to deny it to these last, is against the admitted expediency of the whole bill.

It is plain, therefore, that there is no course for those opposed to the clause in question, but to go against the principle of the whole bill, as is done, in point of fact, by the gentleman from North Carolina, and the gentleman from Indiana. I shall not engage in the defence of that principle, for it is sufficiently established in the legislation of the country. I cannot, however, forbear a reply to one or two remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TEST] by which he seemed to distinguish between this case and that of the widows and orphans of officers and seamen killed in battle. He thinks that, in time of peace, the service is on a different footing from what it is in time of war, and less meritorious. If there is any difference, however, the service is more attractive in time of war; and it is more peculiarly necessary, in time of peace, on public grounds, to strengthen the encouragements which it presents. As to the officers, of course, no distinction exists; they engage in the service for life. The men enlist for limited terms; but I believe the calculation, whether it is a time of peace or war, or whether a war is likely sooner or later to happen, never enters into their heads; and, as far as the temptations to enlist exist, it is as easy to enlist a crew in time of war as in peace. I believe, sir, that every motive of fair policy requires these encouragements in the service rather in time of peace than war.

The Judiciary.—Indian Affairs.

The gentleman said, the vessel was not lost in battle, but by casualty; it was not a danger to be bravely encountered; no energetic act was to be performed. I differ from the gentleman. I believe that a storm, violent enough to destroy a ship of war, is far more dangerous and terrific to landsmen or seamen, than any battle that was ever fought. Gentlemen recollect the descriptions that we have had of the frightful storm which swept the Gulf of Mexico, about the 10th of September, and in which it is supposed the Hornet was lost. A letter has gone the rounds of the newspapers, from a vessel which was on the outer verge of the range of this storm; and the captain represents it as dreadful beyond description. Do gentlemen tell me that the condition of a vessel of war, oppressed by her armament, in such a storm, is nothing compared to a battle? Sir, a battle has no terrors to the gallant seaman. It is full of hope, promise, glory, and even reward, if no higher motive operated. But what is there to animate and cheer him in one of those tremendous tempests, to enable him to bear the labor, and brave the dangers that surround him? I am well persuaded, sir, that there was not one individual, man or officer, on board the unfortunate Hornet, whose muscles were not stiff with labor; whose nerves were not strained with agony, before he went down to his watery grave. And suppose it had been told them, at the last dreadful hour, that, within four months, a pittance like this (and a miserable pittance, after all, it is) would be proposed in the Congress of the United States, for the relief of the widows, the mothers, the children, the sisters, dependant on them for support, and whom they should never behold again, and that this poor pittance would be denied, would it not have added unspeakably to the agony of that last moment, and have embittered the bitter cup of death? Sir, I speak with feeling on the subject; and with good reason. Among my neighbors, there are some included within the provisions of this bill. I speak for the widow and orphan, whose wants have been brought home to me. It is my duty to them, my duty to myself, to oppose the recommitment. I hope the clause will not be stricken out; but that the bill will pass, as it came from the Committee of the Whole.

The question being then taken on the motion of Mr. TEST, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, by 114 votes to 70.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

THE JUDICIARY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, on the bill establishing circuit courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of certain district courts.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, moved an amendment, the object of which was to add three judges to the bench of the Supreme Court, and to arrange the circuits in the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama, among these three additional judges.

After some observations from Mr. BUCHANAN in opposition to, and from Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, in favor of, the amendment, it was rejected without a division.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, then moved an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to equalize the Atlantic circuits thus: the first circuit, consisting of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, to remain as it is; the second circuit, consisting of Vermont, Connecticut, and New York, to remain as it is; the third circuit to consist of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware; the fourth, of Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina; the fifth, of South Carolina and Georgia; the sixth, of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri; the seventh, of Kentucky and Tennessee. The amendment then proposes that a circuit judge be appointed, with all the powers of a judge of the Supreme Court, (except that he is not to sit on the bench of the Supreme Court,) who, in conjunction with the district judges of the respective districts, shall hold circuit courts, twice in each year, in the States of Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana.

After this amendment was read and ordered to be printed, the committee rose.

[On Friday and Saturday there was no debate of general interest.]

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1830.

The House was this day principally concerned in the discussion of appropriation bills.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1830.

THE JUDICIARY.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and took up the Judiciary bill.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, rose, and addressed the committee about an hour and a half in support of his amendment, and in explanation of his views of the whole subject under consideration. He had not concluded, when he gave way for a motion for the committee to rise.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1830.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred that part of the President's message which relates to the Indian Affairs, and sundry resolutions

Indian Affairs.

H. of R.

and memorials upon the same subject, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill to provide for the removal of the Indian tribes within any of the States and Territories, and for their permanent settlement west of the river Mississippi; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the report and documents, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said this was a subject of great importance; the more, as he had no doubt, from the nature of the numerous memorials presented to the House, that great misapprehension prevailed in the country on the subject. It was commonly believed that the Indians were to be removed from the Southern States by force; and nothing was further from the intention of Congress, or of the State of Georgia either, than this. It was right to correct the erroneous impression of the public on this subject; and he therefore moved that ten thousand additional copies of the report be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. BURGESS did not rise to controvert the printing of any number of copies of the report, but in some sort to controvert the idea suggested, namely, that misapprehension and error had gone abroad on this subject. The gentleman said nothing was further from the intention of this Government and of Georgia, than to remove the Indians by force. Mr. B. presumed that nothing of this sort was intended by the Government of the United States; but when he saw Georgia making laws to extend over the Indians her jurisdiction, and excluding them from the exercise of their own rights, and calculated to drive them off, he could not agree to the remark of the gentleman. He hoped the motion would be postponed for a week, by which time the report would be printed, and the House could see what it was, and whether it was such as to deserve this great circulation among the people.

Mr. WILDE said, he did not intend to be drawn into a premature discussion—premature, at least, in his judgment—of the highly important questions involved in the bill and report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which had not yet been read. He agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] that great misapprehension had existed on this subject, and disagreed with the gentleman from Rhode Island, who insisted that there was no misapprehension in relation to the policy and conduct of the State of Georgia. That State had indeed made provision prospectively for extending her laws over every person within her limits. In doing so, she had done no more than had recently been done by some of the new States—nothing more than had long since been done by several of the old ones. He denied that the State of Georgia entertained the project of driving the Indians from her soil by force; and he believed he had at least as good an opportunity of being informed as to the views and policy of that State, as the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island.

On a proper occasion he would enter into an examination of that policy. And he imagined it would not be difficult to prove that she had treated the Indians within her limits with as much forbearance, humanity, and good faith, as any of the States in which she has found accusers. He would not institute, yet he should not shun, a comparison between her conduct in this respect, and that of any of the old States; and he promised gentlemen, if they did think proper to institute it, he would follow it out as far as his knowledge of their history extended, and the patience of the House would allow him.

At present, he was desirous merely of correcting another misapprehension, in regard to the great excitement and deep interest which it was supposed the State of Georgia felt in the proceedings of Congress on this subject. He believed there was no such excitement as had been imagined. That State knew her rights, and was always ready and able to maintain them. She knew her duties, too, and had never yet failed to perform them. To the legislation of Congress, relative to the Indians within her jurisdiction, she looked without apprehension, certain that it would be limited to its only constitutional objects, and without solicitude, except that which she felt in common with every other State, in the condition of these children of the forest. Her interest in the question had been vastly exaggerated. The number of Indians within her limits was but little greater than that within the territory of New York, and their hunting grounds comprised about five millions of acres.

Her relations with the United States on the subject of these lands were indeed peculiar; and, when it became the subject of discussion, it would be seen whether blame rested any where, and with whom. It was enough now to avoid lending sanction, by his silence, to errors of dangerous tendency. He trusted that the largest number of the report proposed would be printed. All who had taken so active and ardent an interest in the affairs of the Indians and Georgia, would naturally be desirous of seeing the facts and arguments of the committee. It was to be hoped many of those persons were sincere inquirers after truth. Let us, then, afford them whatever light we have, to guide them in their search.

Mr. BATES could not, until he knew what the report was, consent to order this great extra number to be printed. He had great confidence in the committee which made the report, and especially for the honorable chairman: but he wished the report to lie on the table until tomorrow or next day, to afford an opportunity for examining it; and he moved to postpone the motion for the extra printing until to-morrow.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, called for the reading of the report. This was opposed by Mr. SUTHERLAND, as a useless waste of time; and was insisted on by Mr. THOMPSON, who said it was necessary, in as much as the not knowing what it contained was made a plea for objecting to the printing.

Mr. REED deprecated this departure from the old usage of the House, which was growing up. It had been the practice to print the usual numbers of a document, and, when read and understood, if found of great interest, to print an extra number. Now, it was becoming customary, when a report was made, for some gentleman, not a member of the committee, but knowing something of it he supposed, to get up, and move an extraordinary number of copies. He hoped before this was agreed to, in the present case, the House would be enabled to know the contents of the report.

Mr. THOMPSON said, in deference to the opinions of friends near him, he would withdraw the call for the reading.

Mr. TAYLOR said a few words in favor of the postponement; and if that were not carried, he should call for the reading himself, as he could not vote for this extra number without knowing something of the report.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose to insist on the opinion which he had expressed, that great misapprehension existed in the country respecting this Indian question. The memorials which loaded the tables of this House proved this fact. He was satisfied that the fears of memorialists respecting the intentions of the Government, and of the State of Georgia, were totally groundless. The forcible removal of the Indians was thought, in many parts of the country, to be resolved on—a great excitement prevailed on the subject—enthusiasts have been busy in scattering firebrands and arrows throughout the country relative to this subject, calculated to create discord, to sow the seeds of disunion, and to sever brethren who ought ever to be united. It was proper the people should have information to remove the error prevalent on this subject; and who [he asked] would desire to keep such information from the people?

Mr. WICKLIFFE would be willing to print the same number of this report as had been ordered of a report on the same subject made some years ago—he believed at the close of the nineteenth Congress—but no more. That report was made; and, without being read, a large additional number of copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, said the gentleman was mistaken. He [Mr. E.] made that report himself, and he well remembered that it was read through to the House, before the printing was ordered. But as to the other question, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had said that great misapprehension existed in the country on this Indian subject; and gave that as a reason for moving the large additional number of copies of the report. Mr. E. said, he would not contend about the correctness of this opinion, because that would be plunging into the discussion. But when the House is told that great error of opinion prevails on this subject, and that a certain document is calculated to contradict that opinion and correct the misapprehension, would the House favor the extensive distribution of that document without first hearing it? Was it not proper first to know what opinions it contradicts, and what it affirms? He had so much confidence in the committee, that had the printing been moved without any reason but the interest of the subject, he would have voted for it without hesitation; but it was the reason assigned for the motion which made him averse to consent to it.

Mr. GOODENOW, of Ohio, was in favor of the extra number of copies. As the subject was one of great importance, and as he had perfect confidence in the committee, he was willing, on the faith of that confidence, to vote for the motion. There was nothing, he thought, more important, there was nothing more dear to him, than giving information to the people.

Mr. LAMAR, of Georgia, said he would not now enter into any discussion of the subject; but, when the time came, he could show, that, in the conduct of Georgia respecting the Indians, there was nothing inconsistent with the constitution or with propriety. That now was not the question; but it was true that great misapprehension existed in some parts of the country on the subject; the newspapers had teemed with statements and comments calculated to mislead the public mind; and he hoped that a large number of this report might be printed, and distributed among the people, to counteract the great misrepresentation on the subject.

Mr. STERIGERE, of Pennsylvania, took it for granted that the report embraced all the laws of Georgia respecting the Indians, and all the facts of the case, presented in a fair view; and, as it would therefore enable the people to form a correct opinion on the subject, he was in favor of printing the additional copies. Mr. S. concurred in the opinion that the most erroneous impressions were entertained among the people on this subject. His own correspondence, as well as the numerous petitions received by this House, convinced him of the fact. He had received a letter lately from home, expressing surprise at a proposition now before Congress, as was honestly believed, for removing the Indians by force; and the people in his part of the country were actually holding meetings to petition Congress against such a measure. Another letter was in favor of the extension of jurisdiction over the Indians by the State of Georgia; but protested against the contemplated forcible removal, in favor of that which has been done, and against that which is not intended. He cited other cases to establish the fact of great misapprehension on the subject; and as this report would correct those erroneous impressions, he was in favor of the extra number.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, preferred knowing for himself what the report contained, before he voted for printing this large additional number. The debate had consumed more time than the reading of the report could have done, and he wished it read. He had voted, some days ago, for printing six thousand copies of a report, without its being read, [the report made by Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Commerce,] and he confessed, if he had known what that report contained, he should have voted differently. He was resolved not to commit the same error again.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, said the objection to the printing seemed to be the idea that the report was a partial one, an argument on one side. This was mere presumption, and ought not to hinder the distribution of the information which it contained among the people. Supposing the character of the report such as was imputed to it, the House had printed a large extra number of a former report of an opposite character, and it would be unfair to withhold this.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, seeing no end to this debate, and perceiving its tendency to a premature discussion of the whole subject, if indulged, moved the previous question; but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. CAMBRELENG, who regretted to hear what the gentleman [Mr. MILLER] had said about the report of the Committee on Commerce. He knew not whether to consider those remarks as implying a compliment or a censure, but he was bound to receive them as complimentary. Would that gentleman suppress information, or withhold it from the people, because it might not correspond with his own views, or because he might dissent from the deductions from it. Mr. C. was surprised at the opposition to printing the extra number of the present report. There had been an Indian war raging out of doors; and he wished to have the question brought in here, where they might have a fair and honorable war with the other side, who had been carrying it on out of doors. He should like to see who were the members that were opposed to having this question placed fairly before the people; and he, therefore, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion for postponement.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said that he wished to vote understandingly on every matter connected with so delicate and important a subject as that before the House. He might or might not agree to the principles of the report, and could not say whether he did or not, as it had not been read to the House, and he did not know exactly what the report was. He hoped that he should not be pressed to vote blindfolded on any question relating to it. He had, during the debate, looked very slightly at some of the sheets at the table, but had not time to read a passage of it carefully. In that part which he cast his eye upon, he saw that a paragraph from an opinion was quoted from a case in the Supreme Court of New York, but he had not time to look and see whether the report further stated that the case had been reversed in the court of errors there. He wanted information as to the nature of the report and its principles. At any rate, he did not wish to act in darkness upon it. He moved that it should be read to the House, and asked the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question was taken on the reading of the report, and decided in the affirmative: yeas, 120—nays, 56.

The Clerk accordingly commenced reading, and had proceeded about half an hour; when

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved to dispense with the further reading, which was agreed to—78 to 57.

A motion was then (about three o'clock) made to adjourn, and lost: yeas, 48—nays, 90.

Mr. WHITE now renewed his motion for the previous question, which was seconded by a majority of the House.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, then moved to lay the motion for printing on the table, and called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being called, the motion to lay on the table was lost: yeas, 37—nays, 143.

West Point Academy.

[H. of R.]

The previous question recurring, Mr. VANCE demanded the yeas and nays on it, and they were ordered.

And the previous question being put, "Shall the main question be now put?" it was carried: yeas, 126—nays, 48.

The main question was then accordingly put, viz. on the motion to print ten thousand additional copies of the report, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas, 113—nays, 56.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1830.

Mr. CROCKETT moved the following resolutions, viz.

1. Resolved, That if the bounty of the Government is to be at all bestowed, the destitute poor, and not the rich and influential, are the objects who most claim it, and to whom the voice of humanity most loudly calls the attention of Congress.

2. Resolved, That no one class of the citizens of these United States has an exclusive right to demand or receive, for purposes of education, or for other purposes, more than an equal and ratable proportion of the funds of the national treasury, which is replenished by a common contribution, and, in some instances, more at the cost of the poor man, who has but little to defend, than that of the rich man, who seldom fights to defend himself or his property.

3. Resolved, That each and every institution, calculated, at public expense, and under the patronage and sanction of the Government, to grant exclusive privileges except in consideration of public services, is not only aristocratic, but a downright invasion of the rights of the citizen, and a violation of the civil compact called "the constitution."

4. Resolved, further, That the Military Academy at West Point is subject to the foregoing objections, in as much as those who are educated there receive their instruction at the public expense, and are generally the sons of the rich and influential, who are able to educate their own children. While the sons of the poor, for want of active friends, are often neglected, or if educated, even at the expense of their parents, or by the liberality of their friends, are superseded in the service by cadets educated at the West Point academy.

5. Resolved, therefore, and for the foregoing reasons, That said institution should be abolished, and the appropriations annually made for its support be discontinued.

Mr. CROCKETT said he had endeavored some days ago to get an opportunity to offer this resolution, without being able to succeed. He submitted it in compliance with a duty which he owed his country, and to his constituents especially. The people who sent him here were opposed to this institution; he had talked to the people on the subject; they had told him what their opinions were respecting it, and, if he kept his mouth shut here, he would not discharge his duty faithfully. He believed the resolution to be correct; the institution was kept up for the education of the sons of the noble and wealthy, and of members of Congress, people of influence, and not for the children of the poor. Indeed, it could be of little use to the poor any how; for if a poor boy could by chance get appointed, he could not get there, the expense would be too great; and if he could get there, it would be at the risk of his ruin, as the chance would be that he would have to go home on his own means. It was not proper that the money of the Government should be expended in educating the children of the noble and wealthy; that money was raised from the poor man's pocket as well as the rich. Every poor man, who buys a bushel of salt to salt his pork, or a pound of sugar for his children, or a piece of cloth for his coat, pays his portion of the taxes out of which this West Point academy was maintained for the education of rich men's sons for nothing, twenty-eight dollars a month besides. Another bad effect of it was, that no man could get a commission in the army unless he had been educated at West Point; but the army had been headed very well by men who never went to that academy. He remembered, in the little struggle we had a few years ago, he had gone out and performed his twelve months tour of duty in the defence of his country, as well as he could. He did not mention this to boast of it; he there saw thousands of poor men who had also gone out to fight their country's battles, but none of them had ever been at West Point, and none of them had any sons at West Point. A man could fight the battles of his country, and lead his country's armies, without being educated at West Point. Jackson never went to West Point school, nor Brown—no, nor Governor Carroll; nor did Colonel Cannon, under whom Mr. C. said he served, and a faithful good officer he was.

The truth was, [said Mr. C.] this academy did not suit the people of our country, and they were against it; the men who are raised there are too nice to work; they are first educated there for nothing, and then they must have salaries to support them after they leave there—this does not suit the notions of working people, of men who had to get their bread by their labor. He, therefore, felt it his duty to oppose this institution. He had intended, when the appropriation bills should come up, to move to strike out the appropriation for the support of this academy; and he waited the other day till after three o'clock, when it was expected they would be taken up, when the House was in committee; and, after he went away, the bills were taken up, and passed through the committee.

Mr. C. wanted information for the people about this academy; perhaps they did not know enough about it; some of them, may be, had never heard of it, and he wanted to let them hear of it, and know all about it. He must say, however, that he did not offer his resolution with much hope of succeeding; there were too many gentlemen in the House interested in this academy, he feared, to allow his resolution to pass; but it was his duty to try.

A great deal had been said in the House about retrenchment, and they had been several weeks spending time every day in trying to dismiss a poor little draughtsman, who every body admitted had been useful, and whose duties were necessary; notwithstanding this, he must be dismissed for the sake of retrenchment. Well, what was the consequence? Why, as soon as his office was voted down, up get gentlemen to move that the committee have the same work done by the job, which every body knows is an expensive way of having public work done. That resolution, sir—[The Speaker reminded Mr. C. that it was not in order to introduce those resolutions in debate on the present question.]

Mr. C. said, he did not want to break the rules, but he thought it could do no harm to point out these things, and if we are going to retrench, [said he] let us retrench so that we can feel it. As for this academy, however, [said Mr. C.] the young men educated there did not suit our service; they were too delicate, and could not rough it in the army like men differently raised. When they left the school, they were too nice for hard service. He had seen them about here, and he supposed they had good salaries, which the poor people, who consumed the salt and other things which were taxed, had to pay.

Let us [said Mr. C.] put this institution down a little while, and see how it will work. He believed the true interest of the Government was to put it down, although he did not, for the reason before given, hope much to succeed. He wished, however, to see how the House stood on it, and he therefore requested the yeas and nays on his resolution.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that the resolution was one of much importance. He would agree with the gentleman, that there were many abuses connected with the institution; but, as the resolution ought not to be hastily acted on, he moved to lay it on the table, and print it, which motion was agreed to.

H. of R.]

Ardent Spirits in the Navy.

[FEB. 25, 1830.]

ARDENT SPIRITS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. CONDUCT offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of inducing the seamen and marines in the navy of the United States, voluntarily to discontinue the use of ardent spirits, or vinous or fermented liquors, by substituting for it double its value in other necessaries and comforts whilst in service, or in money payable at the expiration of the service.

2. Resolved, also, As a further inducement to sobriety and orderly deportment in the navy, as well as with a view to preserve the lives and morals of the seamen and marines, that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing some additional bounty, in money or clothing, or both, to be paid to every seaman and marine, at the expiration of his service, who shall produce from his commanding officer a certificate of total abstinence from ardent spirits, and of orderly behavior, during the term of his engagement.

3. Resolved, also, That the said committee inquire and report whether or not the public service, as well as the health, morals, and honor of the naval officers would be promoted by holding out to the midshipmen and junior officers some further inducements and incentives to abstinence from all intoxicating liquors.

Mr. CONDUCT remarked that this subject had been already referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, but they, under the impression that it was not within their province to report with respect to the navy, merely reported with respect to the army. They made a favorable report in regard to the army; and it was because they declined reporting on the other branch of the service, that he offered this resolution to refer the inquiry to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOFFMAN said that no man could rejoice more than he would if the use of ardent spirits were discontinued in the navy of the United States; nor was any man more convinced than he was of its injurious effects. But this ought to be left to the discretion of individuals, for he believed that no regulations would effect the object which the honorable mover of the resolution has in view. The resolution, it appears, deems whiskey that vulgar, democratic drink which Captain Basil Hall so strenuously condemned. Mr. H. said, that when the people could procure good wine, although it is not so strong a drink, yet they would not ask for whiskey. With all our anxiety, it would be found that any regulations we can introduce will be impracticable. The matter should be left optional with the officers and sailors themselves; and the example set to them by our people, and the judgment of the country, will be more effectual than any regulations we can adopt. It may be expedient [said Mr. H.] to make our sailors cold water drinkers. He did not think so. He feared it would have the effect of reducing their efficiency, of impairing the courage, the generosity, and bravery, and all the other qualifications incidental to the character of our navy. If by the resolution it is intended to dispense entirely with the use of ardent spirits in our navy, the object would not, in his opinion, be obtained. If any gentleman will point out some practical scheme whereby to do away with this practice—because some practical measure will be necessary—he would willingly give it his support. He called on any gentleman to point out a practical scheme. He felt indebted to the humanity of the gentlemen who brought this subject under consideration; but he repeated that he wanted them to send to the committee some practical scheme to effect their object, which the committee could report; otherwise, all their good and humane intentions would evaporate, and the adoption of these regulations would not be attended with any practical results. No one in the service was now obliged to drink ardent spirits, and he thought its discontinuance could not be enforced with advantage.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, he did not believe that any practical results would be derived from the adoption of this resolution. He did not like the introduction of such topics into this Hall; and, when he said so, he did not intend any disrespect to the gentleman who moved the resolution. He knew [he said] that temperance societies of ladies and gentlemen had been established throughout the country, and he did not doubt the benevolence of their efforts to prevent the use of ardent spirits. He objected to them for one reason only. What [he asked] would the future historian of this country have to say when he should be called upon to write the history of the events of the early part of the nineteenth century? Will he not describe us as a nation of drunkards? That historian would say, to such an extent had this vice been carried, that ladies formed themselves into societies for the promotion of temperance, and for the suppression of the vice of drunkenness. He hoped that to such a description of the state of our society, erroneous in point of fact, Congress would not give its false sanction by legislating on this subject, and especially when no practical benefit can arise from the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. W. moved to lay the resolution on the table, but subsequently withdrew it at the request of

Mr. DRAYTON, who said the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] is opposed to the resolution, because he thinks what it seeks for cannot be accomplished. He says, that in the Naval Committee the subject has been more than once considered, and that no practical mode occurred to its members, by which they could put a stop to intemperance in the navy or marine corps; that he deplored its existence as productive of the most injurious consequences, and would gladly eradicate it, if it were in his power to do so. He added, that whiskey, in moderate quantity, was not prejudicial; that it was sometimes necessary to the health and vigor of the seamen; that it ought not, therefore, to be altogether interdicted; and that he placed no reliance in legislation as a remedy for the evil complained of. The surgeons and the officers in the army and the navy tell us, as will be seen by documents which have been laid upon our tables, that ardent spirits never contribute to the health or permanent comfort of the sailor or the soldier; and that the intemperate use of them, in a greater degree than all other causes combined, occasions crimes, insubordination, punishments, diseases, and deaths. Admitting, then, that a small quantity of strong liquor is not injurious, as it is not beneficial, no reasons exist for drinking it. But it cannot have escaped our observation, that its habitual consumption, even in moderation, too frequently excites a desire for more, and gradually leads to the grossest excess. Much as I deprecate the baleful consequences of drunken debauchery, I entirely concur with the gentleman from New York, in the impolicy of endeavoring to correct it by a prohibitory law, which might raise a spirit of discontent, counteracting the object of the law. I am opposed to sudden and violent innovations. Reformation must commence with the delinquent himself. If, by appealing to the moral sense of the sailor, by diminishing the temptations to which he is exposed, by increasing his comforts, and adding to his pecuniary stipend, an impression can be made upon him, hopes may be entertained that the impression will be durable. Those powerful inducements to human action, self-respect and interest, may thus be brought to operate upon him. And this course, according to the language of the resolution of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CONNELL] is all that is required from this House. That from its beneficial effects may be calculated upon, has been demonstrated by several instances, in which it has proved successful in the army, in the navy, and in our merchant ships.

Indian Affairs.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] is adverse to the resolution, because he conceives it to have originated in temperance societies, or similar associations, from which have issued numerous memorials and petitions of a certain cast, with which our tables have been frequently covered. Sir, no one condemns more than I do the language and the spirit of many of the papers to which the gentleman alludes. I can assure him, that the only persons with whom I have had any communication relating to the subject before us, are physicians in the army and navy and military officers. But were it otherwise—were this resolution pressed upon us by visionaries and theorists, pushing their abstract notions of morality and benevolence to fanatical or ridiculous extremes, if it contained suggestions useful and practical, I would listen to them. Whether we shall be enabled, by any means which we can devise, to effect what is contemplated by the resolution, I will not undertake to determine. It is our duty to make the effort. If we fail, we shall have the consolation of reflecting, that we have attempted to check the progress of a vice which renders its victims not only useless and disgusting, but a burden upon society. If we succeed, though success may be only partial, we shall improve the intellectual, and moral, and physical condition of our army and our navy. I trust, therefore, that the resolution will be adopted, and that an opportunity will be afforded for making an experiment, by which much may be gained, and from which no possible injury can result.

Mr. HOFFMAN rose to reply, but the expiration of the hour cut short the debate.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The rule having been suspended,

Mr. VINTON moved the following order:

Ordered, That a law of the State of Georgia, and a law of the State of Alabama, and Mississippi, to extend the jurisdiction of those States over the Indian tribes within their respective territorial limits, be printed, and appended to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, directed yesterday to be printed.

Mr. VINTON said, that he wished, yesterday, when the question on printing an additional number of copies of the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs was under consideration, to make an inquiry of the chairman of that committee, but it was decided by the Chair that such an inquiry was not then in order. The object he had then in view, was to ascertain whether the laws of the States of Georgia and Alabama, extending the jurisdiction of those States over the Indian tribes residing within their limits, were appended to the report of the committee. Having since learned that they were not, he said that he had now risen to move that these laws be printed, and appended to it. It was yesterday said that wrong impressions had obtained in the community; that much misrepresentation had gone abroad in reference to the intentions of Georgia towards the Indian tribes within her territory; but as he had not seen the laws of that State relating to this subject, he was unable to form any opinion whether these impressions are correct or not. It is [said Mr. V.] a fair presumption that the State of Georgia intends to execute her laws, whatever they may be, bearing on this matter; and perhaps it would be unfair to presume that she intends to do anything more than execute them. For the purpose of correcting the erroneous impressions which, it is said, have gone abroad, and to arrest the progress of the alleged misrepresentations, he voted to print an extra number of copies of the report of the committee, to be distributed amongst the people, so as to give them correct information on the subject. When the bill for the removal of the Indians shall come up for discussion, the character of the laws of these States, extending their jurisdiction over the Indian tribes within their limits, will unavoidably be drawn into the debate. The questions, whether these laws conflict with the existing treaties of the United States with these tribes? with any of the admitted rights of the Indians or of the United States? These are grave questions, which we must decide. These laws, therefore, ought, in his opinion, to be published; and, unless they are, he would ask, how are the people to judge whether the impressions they have already received are correct? When we send out the commentary on these laws, why not also send out the laws themselves, so that the public may be enabled to decide whether the commentary is sustained by the text. Entertaining these views, he moved that the laws of Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi, extending their jurisdiction over the Indian tribes within their territorial limits, be printed, and appended to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LUMPKIN said that the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio appeared to him to be one of an extraordinary character. A standing committee of this House makes a report on a subject according to their views of it; and, after having presented it, and the House has ordered it to be printed, a gentleman gets up in his place, and proposes that certain information, which he supposes is required, should be added to it. For my own part [said Mr. L.] I have no objection to the laws referred to, being distributed through every hamlet, town, and county in the United States; nor do I care how they are distributed; but I cannot consent that they shall be appended to a report of a standing committee of this House. There would be no impropriety in a motion to print these laws; but, to move that they should be printed as an appendage to a report, is, in my opinion, rather an extraordinary idea. The gentleman, with equal propriety, might move to print and attach to this report the laws of New York, Massachusetts, &c. relating to the Indian tribes. We are not unwilling to publish these laws, but we object to have a report of a committee of this House encumbered with them. We have had presented to us so many memorials on this subject, with references to books of history, &c., that it would be impossible to append them all to the report, without rendering it too voluminous. The committee have, therefore, exercised their judgment in making selections from the whole.

Mr. GOODENOW said, he did not rise to enter into the debate, but merely to make a few remarks with regard to the propriety of adopting the motion made by his colleague, [Mr. VINTON] whose suggestion, that peradventure the committee may not have made fair inferences from the laws of the States, by them quoted or referred to, and therefore we ought to append to their report those laws, tends to cast suspicion upon the committee and their report, and weakens its effect. To adopt this motion, would be setting a precedent, improvident, to say the least of it. When a respectable standing committee of this House make a report upon a subject referred to them, and illustrate their views by references or extracts from the laws of the States or of the Union, why suspect their integrity, or their commentaries, at the threshold, before any examination of that report is made—before an inaccurate quotation is detected—before any erroneous conclusion or inference is exposed? We refer matters submitted to the decision of this House to a committee always supposed to be in favor of the subject referred, who are expected to present in their report a fair, and, usually, the most favorable view of it; and, without knowing whether they have honestly and ingeniously examined, and made a full and impartial exposition of it, why should we censure them, by tacking to their report that which they did not consider necessary to accompany it? The opposition to the report, in its present form, seems to rest on the suggestion that perhaps the laws, sought now to be incorporated at large in the printing of the report, may be inaccurately quoted, or an unfair exposition thereof may have been made. When the gentleman shall have detected any misquotation, or error in commentary, then will the time come for the House to act upon his proposition. I hope my colleague will see, on reflection, that it would be setting a bad precedent, to say, by a solemn act of the House, before any inaccuracy or error be detected in a report of a respectable committee, lest it may contain an erroneous commentary, the original text shall be published, and appended to it. I wish the report to go to the world as the committee have given it to us, unincumbered by any extraneous matter; and I do hope, on further reflection, my colleague [Mr. VINTON] will perceive the impropriety of urging his motion.

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, said he did not intend to complain of the resolution proposed. He must, however, be permitted to say, it was one of a very extraordinary character. He would venture to say, that, if the journals of this House, from the organization of this Government down to the present day, were searched, a proposition to print the laws of a particular State, for the information of the people at large, could not be found. The House frequently, and for the use of its own members, on particular occasions, order the printing of a State law; but to publish them for general information, is unprecedented. But, [said Mr. F.] what is the reason assigned for the passage of this resolution? It is, that the people at large may be correctly informed as to the provisions of the laws which are to operate on the Indians. Now, sir, what object is to be thus attained? What effect can the particular provisions of those laws have on the question of the right of jurisdiction? If the States have the right to extend the operation of their laws over the Indians within their limits, the General Government cannot interfere, even if those laws be of the most cruel and sanguinary character. On the contrary, if they have not the right, they could not acquire it by the enactment of laws the most mild and benignant. He did not intend, at present, to go into an examination of this right—that would more properly present itself on a future occasion. He wished now merely to impress upon the House that the tendency of this resolution was to involve us in a discussion as to the character of State laws, the internal regulations of a State—a matter with which Congress cannot interfere.

But, if gentlemen are determined to publish the laws of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, for the purpose of informing the public at large of their provisions, Mr. F. insisted on attaching to them the laws of all the other States which have extended the operation of their laws over the Indians within their limits. If those three States are to be put on trial before the country, let others, similarly situated, be brought to the same tribunal. Let them undergo a general inspection; place the different statutes of each side by side, and let the public have an opportunity of judging impartially between them. For this purpose, Mr. F. had prepared a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON] which he would presently send to the Chair. But he protested against having these laws attached to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The printing of that report had already been ordered, and he wished to have it before the public as soon as possible; but if these laws are to accompany it, considerable delay must be produced. He hoped, therefore, that, if the House determined to publish these laws at all, it would accept of his substitute, and print them separately from the report. For himself, [said Mr. F.] he would candidly add, that, even should the substitute be received, he should ultimately vote against its passage, conceiving it not only unnecessary, but improper, for this House to undertake to publish the laws of the States for the information of the public.

Mr. FOSTER then submitted the following, as a substitute for the resolution of Mr. VINTON:

“That the Clerk of the House be ordered to have printed the laws of the several States, extending and creating jurisdiction over the several Indian tribes within their limits.”

Mr. VINTON said, it was not his object or desire to conceal from the House, or the people, any information that might exist in relation to this subject. He was willing to modify his resolution so as to include the laws of all the States referred to, if gentlemen so pleased. I have had [said Mr. V.] no opportunity of seeing the laws of Alabama and Georgia; and shall I be, under such circumstances, compelled to decide on this subject without ever having seen the laws relating to it? In my opinion, this information is required, not only by the people of this country, but by this House, for a fair and full examination of the subject; and when I say that, without it, the report is incomplete and imperfect, I do not mean to cast any reflections on the committee. In order to judge of the report correctly, we must read the laws upon which the report is founded; and when I have had an opportunity to do so, for one, I will endeavor to form a just and impartial opinion of their true character. I am willing, therefore, to accept the modification of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FOSTER] and I hope he will withdraw that part of his motion which proposes to lay the whole upon the table. Mr. V. said he wished to have all the information which can be procured in relation to this question laid before the House and the country.

Mr. WILDE said, he would not oppose printing any document wanted for the information of the House: it could hardly be requisite, however, for that purpose, to print ten thousand copies of the laws in question. They had long since been published in the gazettes of the States which passed them, and copied into other newspapers throughout the Union. If they were now wanted for the use of the members of Congress, the usual number would be sufficient. But if information of this description was required, it occurred to him that a liberal curiosity would not be satisfied by looking into the laws of two, three, or four States only. He trusted it would extend itself to the acts of every State and every provincial assembly which had legislated for the Indians. Much interesting matter might thus be embodied, very satisfactory to the curious in legislation. An opportunity would be afforded for philosophical reflection on the polity of different communities, and various stages of society. He must be allowed, however, to express a doubt whether any errors in public opinion would be corrected, the harmony of the House increased, or the dispassionate consideration of Indian Affairs promoted, by singling out a few laws from a few States, to be dispersed over the country in the form of an appendix to the report of our committee. If injustice had been done to the Indians any where, by State Legislatures, and we are competent to its redress, let the inquiry be co-extensive with the evil. Why not embrace all States and all Indians? If our interference is proper in one instance, is it not equally proper in the rest? But, in any event, it could be necessary, in his view of the subject, to print only what was required for our own information; all beyond that would be sheer waste. He therefore moved to strike out so much of the resolution as proposed to print an extra number of copies to be appended to the report, and offered an amendment, which he hoped his colleague would accept as a substitute—“And, also, so much of the laws of the several States as relates to the Indians within their limits.”

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE] with his usual candor, had admitted that no objection to the printing of these laws could be made, if they were necessary to enable the House to decide correctly on the bill accompanying the report, but that they ought not to be appended to the report; for, if they were needed at all, it was only for the use of the House. If this be so, why was the printing of an extra number of copies of the report deemed expedient? Ten thousand copies, surely, were not necessary for the House merely. Was not this printing ordered on the motion of a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] who urged as a reason for it that erroneous impressions existed in many parts of the country in relation to the subject embraced in the report; and that the people ought to be put in possession of a document by which these supposed misconceptions and erroneous impressions could be corrected? Now, sir, I do not admit that these impressions are erroneous; that the feeling and excitement which exist, in regard to this subject, are without cause. I say nothing now on that point; but if it be so, and this report will tend to remove errors and allay feeling, and an extra number of copies of it has been ordered to be printed to effect this object, surely the laws referred to in the resolution of my friend from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] ought to accompany the report; for they, among other things, have tended to produce the state of feeling and of public sentiment, in some parts of the country, to which allusion has been made. And if it be important that the report be extensively circulated, for the purposes suggested, is it not as important that the laws which are connected with the subject of that report should have an equally extended circulation? Ought they not both to go forth together to the people of this country? I submit, therefore, whether it be entirely consistent to vote for the printing of a large number of the report, for the reasons which were urged in support of it, and to vote against printing an equal number of the laws to accompany it, which are supposed to have an important connexion with the subject of that report.

Mr. H. said, he would make another suggestion. Would it not be as well for the State of Georgia, of which the honorable gentleman is so able a representative; indeed, should she not desire that these laws should accompany the report, if, as is claimed, they afford no pretext for the representations which have been made in various memorials presented to us, on the subject of the Indians within her limits? The honorable member is surely not unwilling that the people should judge for themselves; and, if these laws are of a nature which ought not to occasion any fears lest the rights of the Indians should be invaded, is he unwilling that the people should be possessed of them?

The amendment proposes the printing of such of the laws of the other States of the Union within whose limits Indian tribes exist, as extend or relate to the jurisdiction of such States over those tribes. I interpose no objection to this amendment, if they are appended to the report; though there seems to be a peculiar propriety in printing those referred to in the original resolution, as the Indian tribes within those States are those to which our attention has been particularly called, in the message of the President; and which the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs embraces. I hope, therefore, the honorable member from Georgia will consent to modify his amendment, so as to provide for the annexation of the laws named in it to the report; and let them all go forth to the people at one and the same time, and in one and the same document.

On motion of Mr. HOFFMAN, the resolution and amendment were laid on the table.—Yeas, 94—nays, 42.

The House then went again into Committee of the Whole on the Judiciary bill, when Mr. SPENCER concluded the remarks which he commenced on a former day against the bill, and in favor of his amendment. The committee then rose.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1830.

ARDENT SPIRITS IN THE NAVY.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions moved by Mr. CONDUCT yesterday.

Mr. HOFFMAN said, the supposition of gentlemen, that drunkenness prevailed in a great extent in the navy, is extremely incorrect. The case is not so. He was not an advocate of drinking ardent spirits in any form; but he was opposed to the interference of the Legislature on this subject; he was opposed to the proposition to commute the wages of seamen, if they will not drink their rations of ardent spirits. This is a matter he would leave to their own discretion; for, in attempting to devise measures necessary to effect this object, we must consult the habits and dispositions of the people for whom these measures are intended. All men are the best judges of their own concerns: sometimes we commit mistakes; but if we are wrong in judging for ourselves, we may be wrong in judging for others. The seamen and marines of the United States' navy can judge as well for themselves as the Legislature. These regulations may be adapted to the army, who are always supplied with good fresh water, and have no necessity for the vulgar, democratic whiskey; but it was different with respect to the navy. He had no objection to stopping the use of ardent spirits in the army, as it would, in his opinion, prevent desertions. Mr. H. said, the officers, seamen, and marines of the navy would, if left to themselves, follow the example set to them by the country.

Mr. REED said, if it was right for this House to legislate with respect to the navy, and to prescribe rules for it, it is certainly equally right to legislate on this subject. Dealing out spirits in the navy in small quantities tends to disqualify men for their duty, and is a direct way to make them drunkards. Mr. B. referred to the temperance societies which had been introduced into the debate, and said they contributed much to the improvement of the state of our society; manifestly so, to the great joy of all sober men. He had no hesitation in saying he attributed this improvement to the temperance societies established in the country. He had no doubt that the adoption of this resolution would have good effects on the navy. It has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. DRAXTON] that it has produced beneficial effects in the army. Why [he asked] would it not be attended with similar effects in the navy? Mr. R. hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON said, he should be unfaithful to the principles by which he professed to be governed in this House, and in all other places, if he gave not his voice in support of the resolutions under consideration. The existing law [said Mr. R.] provides that each seaman and marine shall be supplied daily with rations of ardent spirits. However temperate their habits, or disinclined by their taste or early education to the use of ardent spirits, the law holds out to them a strong inducement to become intemperate. It is too well known to be doubted, that the constant use of the quantity of spirits allowed by the law, must necessarily form a strong propensity to excess. The best judges of this matter agree that the use of ardent spirits gives neither vigor to the body, nor courage, nor any other valuable property to the mind. It is said that men are not compelled to the use of spirits. But, sir, it is provided for them by law, and by law measured out to them. If they reject it, they sustain so much loss. They are not permitted to substitute for it articles of real use or necessity. Thus intemperance is virtually imposed on them by public authority. And what do the resolutions propose? They do not propose to deny to any the use of ardent spirits; but they propose to the seamen and marines an inducement to abstain from the use of them. They offer to them the option of having, instead of their rations in spirits, articles that may conduce to their comfort; or double the amount of their rations, to procure bread for their wives and children, or to provide for the seasons of sickness and old age. Sir, [said Mr. R.] I thank the gentleman [Mr. CONDUCT] who offered these resolutions. They do him honor as a friend to his country.

H. of R.]

Ardent Spirits in the Navy.

[FEB. 26, 1830.]

I thank the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DRAVTON] for the able remarks he made yesterday in support of them. They furnish lessons friendly to public virtue. The existing law cannot be defended. With one hand it holds out to those engaged in the public service a constant and strong inducement to intemperance; and, on the other hand, the penalties of disgrace and death for crimes to which intemperance leads. Intemperance is the great instigator of crimes. Its name is "Legion," and its work destruction. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Hon. Mr. WICKLIFFE] yesterday said, that the efforts made "by temperance societies," and what passed in this House to check the vice of intemperance, would justify some future historian in describing this as a nation of drunkards. Do attempts to prevent a vice prove its entire prevalence? [said Mr. R.] That gentleman has been zealously engaged this session in the work of retrenchment. But it is a fair inference, to say that such efforts prove that this Government is extravagant and corrupt in all its departments? The premises will justify no such inference as he thinks may be drawn from them. Sir, I have no hesitation in declaring it as my opinion, and long and deeply settled, that if there be one vice which, more than any other, threatens the liberty and the prosperity of this country, it is the vice of intemperance. I therefore hope that the resolutions will be adopted, and that they will receive the deliberate and solemn consideration of the appropriate committee.

Mr. BURGESS said, he could demonstrate from principles, and would undertake to do it before any college of physicians, that nothing could be swallowed so invigorating, strengthening, and healthy, as cold water. He did not say this in jest; it was too solemn a matter to jest about. Nothing could be more injurious than giving him his regular eleven o'clock or his four o'clock. At first the palate of the boy of fourteen rejects the spirit, but in the mess room he sees, by the example of those who think cold water not sufficiently stimulating, that he cannot become a man until he can take his ration. Let him follow this until he is thirty years of age, and unless his constitution is made of steel, he will be, if not a drunkard, at least a confirmed tippler; and then, if his mind should be by some misfortune thrown off its balance, he would resort to maddening potations. He thought if they succeeded in saving one soul from this perdition, they should do a deed making them worthy of remembrance. When all seemed to be united in restoring the country to the station in which it was some years ago, he thought the House would be acting agreeably to the desires of their constituents if they united with the temperance societies.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said, he rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to certain communications laid on our tables, from the then Secretary of the Navy, intimately connected with the subject of this resolution; and, as he was now up, he would express his regret that any gentleman of this House wished to suppress the benevolent inquiry proposed to be instituted. Mr. E. said there had been no resolution before Congress, this session, of greater magnitude and urgency. He hoped the House would give it a most serious attention. It is one of vital importance to the navy and the country. He was persuaded that opposition must spring from either a disbelief of the fact, viz. the prevalence of intemperance, or that all attempts to eradicate or restrain it were futile. As to the existence of intemperance, to a melancholy degree, in the navy, as well as in the army, no one could, he thought, doubt. He did not wish to speak to the disparagement of the navy. He honored, he gloried in its fame and gallant heroism; but as to the matter of fact, it is as certain as that we are in this hall of legislation. The loathsome objects we meet daily wandering in our streets, the tears and broken hearts of thousands in our land, of parents, wives, and children, testified too strongly not to be believed and felt. We have it, too, from the highest in authority—from the honorable Secretary, and the officers in the naval service. A very intelligent lieutenant of the navy recently informed me that a great proportion, I think he said eight-tenths, of the whipping on board of our national ships was made necessary by intemperance. He said it was a monstrous evil; and who would doubt it, if it caused nothing else but the brutal and debasing practice of whipping.

Mr. E. said, he was astonished that some gentlemen in this House looked upon this subject with so much indifference, if not contempt. As legislators, as men, we have a responsible duty here to perform. We hold in our hands the destiny of thousands, and the well-being of multitudes more. Sir, we legalize drunkenness in our navy. By law, we provide that all, both midshipmen and sailors, shall have their half a pint per day, under all circumstances, in fair weather as well as foul. An enlistment is ordinarily for three years. Now, sir, where are the men to be found, who, after having this daily allowance dealt out to them for this period of time, do not become the victims of a vicious appetite? It is almost impossible they should not. Some few there may be, who have self-government and consideration enough to resist the beneficent provision of the law. But hundreds comply where ten refuse. And such are the surrounding circumstances, that the young and inexperienced cannot resist the influences upon them. We tempt them to taste the poison. We virtually compel them to do it. There are among our midshipmen boys, mere boys; and so, too, among our sailors. Think, sir, of arranging these boys daily with the veteran toppers, to participate in the ruinous potation; and drink their half a pint—twenty-three gallons per year. Let us blush for our laws. Let us mourn over the desolation and death we scatter through the land.

And now, [said Mr. E.] he had to ask if nothing can be done? Is all remedy so perfectly hopeless, that we will not even inquire if something may not be done? The intelligent lieutenant, to whom [he said] he had already referred, told him that something could be done; something like what is proposed in these resolutions; and Mr. E. said he would appeal to the good sense of gentlemen, if they did not believe much might be done. We certainly can place before our seamen a temptation to temperance. This expedient has succeeded on land—it may on water. Much [he said] had been done in some parts of this country; and, although the honorable chairman of the Naval Committee [Mr. HOFFMAN] had, he thought, attempted to ridicule the efforts of temperance societies, and pronounced a sort of eulogy upon that "democratic thing, whiskey," as he repeated several times, for what purpose [said Mr. E.] he could not understand. He would lift up his voice, in this public place, in favor of these benevolent and efficient means of saving our fellow-men. Health, reputation, riches, and life followed in their train. The tears of parents and wives had been dried up, and their hearts made to overflow with expressions of gratitude and joy to the authors of these benevolent movements. Besides, sir, the experiment has been tried in naval service. Mr. E. appealed to France and England. The former [he said] used a cheap wine, and the latter beer, in their navies. We find, sir, [he said] in a letter from the honorable Secretary of War, laid upon our tables the other day, that, in his opinion, intemperance in the army cannot be restrained, because the soldiers will obtain liquor from those who plant themselves in the neighborhood of our military posts and stations. He says, that the most successful experiment in the army has been to impose no restraints upon the soldiers, but let them have as much, and as often as they want, except so far as, by rules of their own making, they impose restraints. Mr. E. said he was no believer in this doctrine. But, however difficult it might be to prevent soldiers from getting liquor from persons in the neighborhood on land, no such difficulty existed in the navy. A ship at sea was a little territory by itself. The commander could do as he pleased; and Mr. E. said he did not believe that there would be much difficulty in inducing habits of temperance, if the Government would set seriously and perseveringly about it.

Mr. E. said, he had detained the House longer than he was aware of, and would resume his seat after reading an extract or two from the letters of Doctors Heerman, Barton, and Harris. At the last Congress, by a resolution of this House, the Secretary of the Navy was requested to obtain the opinions, separately, of three medical officers of the navy, whether it is necessary or expedient that distilled spirits should constitute a part of the rations allowed to midshipmen, and also their opinion of the effect upon the morals and health of the individuals, and upon the character and discipline of the navy. In submitting these opinions, the Secretary says that he deems it unnecessary to add any remarks of his own; in illustration and enforcement of the views therein expressed, further than that they are earnestly concurred in. Mr. E. said, he wished he could read the whole of those letters; but time would not admit of it. He would recommend them to the serious perusal of every one in this House.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he had but one remark to make, and that was, that the practice of this House had of late wonderfully changed, and gentlemen discuss resolutions, proposing merely an inquiry, as if a bill on the subject, or the merits of the question, was before them. He presumed that there was no gentleman opposed to the inquiry which these resolutions proposed, and he hoped they would be permitted to pass without further debate.

The debate was here arrested, the hour for considering resolutions having expired.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions moved by Mr. CONDUCT on the 25th instant; when

A motion was made by Mr. CHILTON to amend the said resolutions, by striking out from the word "Resolved," in the first resolution, to the end of the last resolution, and inserting the following:

"That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire whether the public interest and the cause of morality would be most effectually promoted, by emphatically prohibiting the use of ardent, vinous, and other fermented liquors in the navy of the United States, by the officers and seamen belonging thereto, or by permitting a continuation of the practice of issuing them as rations in said service.

"Resolved, further, That, in the event said committee shall be of opinion that it is expedient to continue the ration aforesaid, in the naval establishment, they be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing some mode for procuring the discontinuance of the use of ardent, vinous, and other fermented liquors in the various civil departments, and among the members of Congress, and others holding offices of either trust, honor, or profit, under the authority of the people of the United States."

Mr. CHILTON said that he was proud to hail the present day as a day of "Retrenchment and Reform;" and indeed so many evidences had been given of a disposition to accomplish each, that it would now amount almost to moral treason to dispute the rapid and mystical progress of either. So far as relates to "Retrenchment," upon a mere guess, [said Mr. C.] I should suppose that not more than one hundred thousand dollars have been expended in arguing the question in its various ramifications, while not one solitary dollar, so far as I am advised, or can understand, has been saved to the Government. I am much surprised, sir, to discover gentlemen, as I humbly think, so vastly inconsistent, and yet so externally sensitive, and ferociously virtuous. These "American system gentlemen," both by precept and example, adopt, in my opinion, a doctrine wholly at war with the provisions of the present proposition, and their former declarations. They have been clamorous for the "Tariff," the encouragement of "Domestic Industry," and an increase of the duties on the importation of articles manufactured abroad. One of the staples of the Western country is whiskey, into which, by distillation, the farmers convert their immense surplus of corn, rye, fruit, &c. To have a market for this article, we must have consumers: to prevent its consumption, no legislative sanction can be adequate. Sir, I am no friend to intemperance, either on land or at sea; but I think it infinitely better to abandon the votary of intemperance to his fate, than to abridge the natural liberties of man.

I make the remark, and I make it seriously, that legislation upon this subject is as useless as was the attempt of King Canute, who, flattered by his courtiers, commanded the "tide to recede," and was well nigh overwhelmed in its waves, before he discovered his presumption and folly.

[Mr. DRAYTON, of South Carolina, here rose, and said that he had heard the amendment read, and it appeared the object of the gentleman was merely to indulge his humor. The SPEAKER, nevertheless, decided that Mr. CHILTON was in order. Whereupon, he proceeded as follows.]

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the gentleman's pardon for his polite interruption of me, while I was surely not interrupting him. I understood perfectly well what I had intended to say, and what it was in order for me to say; and if the gentleman will look more deeply into the question presented, and anticipate me with slower progress, he will perceive that I am in good earnest, and not playing with either the feelings or time of the House. But, sir, as I before remarked, while we are extending through so boundless a range the work of "Retrenchment," I should be gratified to despatch for its helpmate the fair nymph "Reform." Surely its way is lovely—its dimensions being small, and the company of a twin sister cannot be unacceptable.

Whether this "reform" in the navy is to be charged under the head of "cleansing the Augean stable," or whether it properly falls under some other head, I will not pretend to say. But I will say that the legislation is as partial in its effects and character, as was that which I witnessed in this House a few days since; when gentlemen, who even denied me the yeas and nays upon a proposition to "retrench" their own wages, voted to discontinue the humble draughtsman of this House. I am determined in this case, as in that, to try the liberality of gentlemen, and to ascertain whether they are as willing to "retrench" their own allowances of intoxicating liquids, as they are to limit those of others. I venture to predict that in this, as in the instance alluded to, there will be opposition to having the question taken by yeas and nays. It behoves me to show why my substitute should be adopted. It is here attempted to bargain with men to become "virtuous." I am reminded, sir, of a maxim which I learned at an early age, and in which experience has confirmed me, to wit, that "virtue which required to be watched, is not worth watching." Vows to be temperate (where the restraints imposed by public sentiment—by the endearing and heart rending tears which often flow around the domestic fireside—aided by the claims of helpless innocence)—are all insufficient. If the pride of character cannot avail, money cannot.

The question to agree to this amendment was decided in the negative.

Mr. PEARCE then said, he was prepared to express his opinions on this subject; but as he presumed the House had heard enough on it, he moved that the resolutions lie on the table; which motion was negatived: yeas, 57—nays, 108.

The previous question was called for by Mr. STERIGERE; and, being demanded by a majority of the members present, the previous question was put and carried; and

The main question was then put, viz. Will the House agree to the resolutions as moved by Mr. CONDUCT? And passed in the affirmative.

MONDAY, MARCH 1, 1830.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BURGESS presented a memorial from the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends in New England, and moved to have it referred to the same Committee of the Whole to which was referred the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and to have it printed. The question was divided; and on the motion to print, a very animated debate arose.

[Some remarks were made against the printing by two or three gentlemen, which our reporter did not catch; no debate being anticipated on petitions. When he came in, Mr. WHITTLESEY had the floor.]

Mr. WHITTLESEY said, the objections urged by the gentleman from Georgia, against printing the memorial, were, that the expense would be onerous on the treasury; that the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs had been made, and therefore that the publication of the memorial was unnecessary for the action of the committee or of the House, and that the memorial might reflect on the committee. Mr. W. said, in relation to the expense of printing the memorial, he was an advocate for economy; and if he considered the publication to be unnecessary or unusual, or if it could be demonstrated that the treasury was not able to bear the expense, he would go with the gentleman in the vote he was about to give; but he said he much admired, in casting his eye over the House to see who were opposed to the printing of this short memorial, they were of the number who had voted for printing ten thousand copies of the report on Indian Affairs, without hearing it read, or knowing the contents of it, and who had forced the question on the House by calling the previous question. He said it was a subject of much astonishment with him, that gentlemen should be so profuse in expending the public money on one day, and so remarkably economical on another. He said he thought it a little remarkable that it should be objected by any gentleman from the State of Georgia, that the committee had reported, and therefore that the printing was unnecessary. He said he had, since the question was under discussion, examined the executive documents, and he there found that there were many memorials printing on the application of the gentlemen from Georgia and South Carolina, remonstrating against imposing any additional duties on imports. Has the gentleman forgot the presentation of these memorials, and the order of the House to print them? Would the gentleman have been contented, and would he have remained silent, if there had been an objection by any supporter of the great protective system, against printing those memorials which were sent here by agricultural societies and by individuals. By looking at the dates when these memorials were presented, [said Mr. W.] it would be found that they were ordered to be printed both before and after the Committee on Manufactures had made their report. The application, then, [said Mr. W.] was not without precedent. As to there being anything in the memorial that would reflect on the committee, he said he thought that extremely improbable, from the highly respectable source from whence it emanated; and he believed when it was inspected, he thought it would be as temperate at least as the memorials to which he had referred. He said he thought the objections entitled to but little weight, and expressed a hope that the printing would be ordered.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New Hampshire, said, if this memorial had been presented to the House before the Committee on Indian Affairs had reported, would it have been printed? Would the House have ordered in the first instance its publication? Certainly not. Such a course had been unusual. Such a course would not have been taken with this memorial. It would have been referred at once to the committee for their examination, for their consideration, and for them to have reported upon. This has been the course which similar memorials have taken during our present session. And it is the uniform course of proceeding in legislative assemblies. Why, then, I would ask, will you order this single memorial, at this time, to be printed? The only reason which I have heard offered in favor of such a course is, that in as much as the committee have reported on the memorials which have been referred, and as this cannot therefore receive the consideration of the committee, there would be a propriety and fitness in causing it to be printed for the use of the members of this House, who must soon be called upon to act on the subject matter of this memorial. And this of itself would be, in my opinion, a sufficient reason, if the memorial now before us contained any new views, or any different considerations from those which have already been considered. And I was, sir, much gratified when the gentleman from Georgia called for the reading of this paper. I gave particular attention to it. I was anxious to ascertain whether the memorialists had set forth any new views of this all-absorbing subject—whether they had urged any reasons different from those which had been inserted in other memorials which had already received the attention of the committee, and upon which they had already acted; and the views the committee entertained in relation to them, were clearly and distinctly embraced in the report which they had already presented, and which the House had already ordered to be printed, and which report would soon be placed on our tables. But, sir, I take the liberty to inform the House that, as far as the reading of this memorial proceeded, not a single new view was taken, not a new argument was set forth, not an additional reason was urged, which have not already claimed the deliberate attention of the committee. I ask, then, sir, why order this single memorial at this time to be printed? If it had contained views, if it had been replete with considerations not embraced in those which have already been presented, referred, and acted upon, I would most cheerfully agree to the printing of it. I am entirely disposed to give to the people all the information on this subject which can be obtained. But I am wholly unable to discover any good and sufficient reason why this single memorial, at this particular time, should be printed.

I most freely admit, sir, that it has emanated from a highly respectable society in New England. I know that society well. Some of this family reside in my own neighborhood; and there is not a man on the floor of this House who entertains a higher respect for the Society of Friends than myself. My opposition to the printing of this memorial does not arise from any disrespect to the memorialists.

But, sir, it does appear to me (perhaps I may be wrong) that, at this time, after the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs has been presented, should the House order the memorial just offered to be printed, containing no new views from those which have already been considered by that committee, it would seem to declare, as the sentiment of this House, that the reasoning of the committee on this subject had not been satisfactory, and that the House would now order this memorial to be printed, to impugn the report of the committee, and this even before that report had received the deliberate consideration of the House.

Regarding it in this light, I cannot but consider the printing of the memorial at this time, and under these circumstances, as in some measure reflecting on the doings of the committee. I must therefore oppose the proposition.

MARCH 1, 1830.]

Indian Affairs.

[H. of R.]

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, asked if there was not some difference between the claims of the present administration and those of the last. The President was elected by a large majority; he was looked up to for a renovation, and such a one as should secure to the people their legitimate rights. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITTESEY] had said that the tariff memorials of South Carolina and Georgia were printed at the expense of the Government, and the Southern gentlemen made no objection to the expense. Had the gentleman forgotten that memorials from the manufacturing districts were printed also? The gentleman should remember that the system there forced upon us took money from the pockets of the Southern people without their consent, and put it into the pockets of the people of the Northeast, without returning to the Southern people an equivalent. He remembered the mammoth petition upon that subject, which was rolled into the House from Boston. He had been told by a respectable gentleman from New England, that one, or that some of the signers of that memorial had just imported one million seven hundred thousand pounds sterling worth of foreign goods. With respect to the printing of the present memorial, he repeated now what he said before, that it was unnecessary to print it, for the vanity of the authors, if nothing else, would induce them to publish it. He thought the printing would be a useless expense of public treasure. If there was more information upon this subject before the people, it would appear that in some of these intermeddling memorials Georgia has been wantonly aspersed, and that the claims of Georgia are founded in justice, and nothing but sheer justice.

Mr. BATES made a few remarks in reply, in which he said the time spent in the discussion of this motion was worth twenty times told more than the printing. How did the gentleman from Georgia know that the vanity of the Quakers would induce them to publish this document? He apprehended the meeting and the memorialists were influenced by very different motives. Mr. B. referred to the course which had been pursued during the session by the gentleman from Georgia. Hardly a memorial had been presented upon this subject, but it must lie one day upon the table—one day for those gentlemen to inspect it, before it was referred to the committee. But when the committee made their report, no delay was allowed. They called for the printing, and there must be no delay—not a moment. The reading of it also was denied; and the printing of ten thousand copies was ordered, without our knowing any thing about the contents. But now, when a memorial came from the other side, and we asked for the printing of it also, the gentlemen object to it. Oh! it is very expensive! it is altogether useless! He hoped the memorial would be printed.

Mr. BURGESS said, he was refreshed and invigorated when he found no arguments offered against the printing but such as were offered. It would cost too much to print one and a half octavo pages for two hundred and sixteen members to read, because, if the House did not print it, the vanity of the New England Quakers would induce them to publish it themselves! He did not wonder, after this declaration, that the gentleman from Georgia had supposed the New York memorial emanated "from an accidental assemblage in a grog shop." The gentleman seemed to suppose that no one would be induced to write such a thing unless he wished it printed. He could inform the gentleman that it was not an extraordinary thing for a man in New England to know how to write. It would not be wonderful if a laboring man, after his week's work was done, should write as good English on a Saturday afternoon, as a committee of the House. When the gentleman objects to the printing on account of the expense, I believe that to be his real motive, not because I am bound by courtesy to believe it, but because I know the gentleman. But the people will believe no such thing. The people will say that the gentleman must be mistaken as to his motive. We have the charity to believe that he is mistaken.

The other objection which has been urged against the printing of this document, is more extraordinary still. It is not extraordinary that the House should shudder at incurring an expense of five dollars in printing; but it was a little wonderful that a New England gentleman [Mr. HUBBARD] should get up in his place, and say the memorial should not be printed, lest it should reflect on the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs; lest it should reflect on a report which he had not read, and with the contents of which he was not acquainted! Who ever said he reflected upon that report? In the name of all that is merciful, pure, or intelligent, who ever dreamed of such a thing—who ever thought of it, who suggested it? No one. It has not been mentioned. Our object is to obtain contrary views, opinions, and arguments, to read, collate, and compare them. Who ever before deemed that receiving a memorial was reflecting upon the report of a committee? But perhaps the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] meant a sort of logical reflection; as if, because the committee has published a report, if we subsequently receive a paper containing different views, it indicates that the House thinks the committee has not gone exactly right.

We are told by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. THOMPSON] as if to sanctify the opposition to this motion, that the things done under the last administration are not to be looked to as precedents for what we shall do under this. He seems to say that, because General Jackson was elected by such an overwhelming majority, the people are not to expect to have their memorials printed! I am willing to admit that the President was elected not only by a plurality, but by a majority, and that he had every vote if the gentleman pleases, but even then I do not see through the reasoning of the gentleman. I do not know what he would say, unless he means to be understood that, in these days of reform and retrenchment, the President will propose, and this House will save all the money that was lost under the last prodigal administration!

Mr. HUBBARD said, the member from Rhode Island has observed "it was a little wonderful that a New England gentleman should get up in his place, and say that the memorial should not be printed, lest it should reflect on the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs; lest it should reflect on a report which he had not read, and with the contents of which he was not acquainted." Now, sir, I am the member to whom the gentleman has so courteously alluded; and why and wherefore, he perhaps can tell, but I cannot. Sir, I am from New England; and I rejoice in that consideration. And when I shall misrepresent the interests of my own State, or the interests of New England, then let the gentleman express his astonishment at my course. When that gentleman takes occasion here to allege that I have not seen, examined, and well considered the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs; when he undertakes to say that I am not acquainted with the contents of that report; when he undertakes to cast so severe a reflection upon my conduct, he states that which he does not, and which he cannot, know. His attack upon me, sir, is not only unkind in its character, but wholly unmerited as relates to myself. What right has the gentleman from Rhode Island to make such an allegation against any member of this House? What right does he possess to cast so foul an imputation upon me, sir, when I have hardly the honor of a passing acquaintance with him? Such insinuations and such reflections, when made on this floor against me, coming even from the gentleman from Rhode Island, will not pass unheeded. As a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I should feel, sir, as though I richly merited all the abuse which that gentleman seems disposed to cast upon me, if I had consented that the result of their doings, that the report which had found its way into this House, had been presented here without my examination. And I know not by what authority the gentleman from Rhode Island has taken the liberty to assert here that I had not examined the report which proceeded from the committee of which I am a member. Sir, I cannot fail to regard this charge as highly reproachful upon my character as a member of this House; and I stand here to repel it, to declare that it is without foundation. And no gentleman shall take the liberty to utter such language in relation to myself, without at least receiving such an answer as the character of the allegation would seem to call for, and would seem to justify. Now, [said Mr. H.] what were the remarks which I took occasion to make (when up before) in relation to the proposition of the gentleman from Rhode Island to print this memorial, and which have (wholly unprovoked on my part) called from that gentleman the most virulent strictures upon my conduct? Did I object to the printing on account of its being a tax upon our treasury? No, sir. I made no such objection. Did I object on the ground of withholding information from the people? No, sir. I made no such objection. Did I object on the ground that the memorialists were not respectable? No, sir. I am too well acquainted with the character of the Friends in New England, to be warranted in making any such suggestion. Sir, I will endeavor to repeat, substantially, what I said.

I commenced my observations with the inquiry, if this memorial had been presented before the committee had reported, would the House have ordered it to be printed? I said, no; that such a course would be unusual; that it would have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs in the first instance, without being printed, as a matter of course; and the committee would have considered it, and would have reported upon it; and that such had been the invariable proceeding of the House in relation to similar memorials; (with, I believe, a single exception, the memorial from the ladies in Ohio;) and this, in my opinion, was ordered to be printed more from a spirit of commendable courtesy to the memorialists themselves, than from a sense of duty. I remarked, further, that I was rejoiced when the gentleman from Georgia called for the reading of this memorial, as I was anxious to hear it, and that I did hear and did understand it as far as the reading proceeded; and I most distinctly stated that this memorial presented no new views, urged no considerations, not already embraced in other memorials, which had been presented to the House, referred to the committee, and which had received their consideration. The views of the committee on these memorials had been clearly set forth in the report which they had presented to the House.

I did not pretend, sir, that I had heard read the whole of this memorial. But I did state that I had attended to the reading as far as it proceeded; and, that no views were taken of the subject, which had not already claimed the attention of the committee; and I would here suggest, that if this paper had contained any different reasons which had not been considered by the committee, sure I am that the gentleman from Rhode Island would (and properly, in my opinion) urge that circumstance upon the House as a reason for printing this memorial. But, sir, no such argument was offered, for no such fact existed; and I stated, further, sir, as a reason why I opposed the proposition of the gentleman to print, and which I felt myself bound to state, that the presentation of this memorial, at this particular time, after the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs had been made, should the House order it to be printed, in as much as new views were contained in the memorial, that had not been before presented, would seem to declare, as the sentiment of the House, that the reasoning of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that the conclusions deduced from their premises, as presented in their report, were not satisfactory to the House; and, regarding the action of the House in this particular as prematurely impugning the report of the committee, even before that report had been considered, I felt myself bound to oppose the printing of this memorial; and, sir, whether right or wrong, it was the honest impression made on my mind at the time. Not that I am unwilling to give this to the public; if it is the desire of the gentlemen, I will go with them, and print all the memorials presented, some of which are now on the table, and some of which have been referred to the committee, and have been by them considered. If such a proposition were made, I would not oppose it, but I would support it. But I stated, further, sir, that I was not in favor of giving this memorial single handed to the public, and on this account I should vote against the motion to print. These were, substantially, the remarks, and all the remarks, I made; and I ask, was it possible for any gentleman, from my observations, not to understand that I had been a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and, of course, presumed to be somewhat acquainted with their doings? And yet the very honorable gentleman from Rhode Island rises in his place, and expresses his perfect astonishment at the remarks which I, as a member from New England, had seen fit to make, and the reason which I had suggested against publishing the memorial—that “it reflected on the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs,” and most unequivocally asserted that I had not read either the report or the memorial. Sir, as much disposed as I am, and as I ever shall be, to respect age, I never can, and I never will, suffer such a charge of dereliction of my duty to this House, as is implied in the allegation of the venerable gentleman, to pass unnoticed. Sir, this is the first time that I have thrown myself upon the notice of the House, and I much regret that the debate has taken such a course as to bring me into personal collision with any gentleman.

Mr. REED observed that the gentleman [Mr. HENBARD, of New Hampshire] was altogether mistaken in point of fact, in relation to the mode of doing business in the House, and this error had probably led him to an erroneous result. He asks, “would the House have ordered these memorials printed, before the committee had reported?” Certainly; it has been the common course of business in this House, when a petition is presented, if requested and deemed of sufficient importance, to order it to be printed, and at the same time referred to a committee. On the very subject now under consideration, two memorials or petitions have been printed.

This memorial comes from a class of men whom I know to be highly respectable, called Friends or Quakers. They are unobtrusive, and interfere very little with the Government of their country. We see few of their petitions or remonstrances; at the same time, they may justly be ranked among our most valuable and useful citizens. If on the present occasion they have thought proper to present a memorial to this House, stating their views in relation to the Georgia Indians, why not publish it? Why not treat it with the respect and consideration due to the subject, and those who present it? Why not treat it like other memorials of the same character? On what occasion has this House refused to publish a memorial presented by so large and respectable a class of men as the yearly meeting of Quakers in New England? Let it be printed. Let it be read and examined! The Committee on Indian Affairs have no just ground of apprehension on account of their report upon the subject. If their report be correct, it will stand the test of argument. The memorial can do it no harm. On the other hand, if the report be erroneous, it should be the desire of all to know it. It should be our aim to seek light and truth wherever to be found, and finally judge with impartiality.

Mr. DANIEL made a few remarks, the purport of which was, that there was an excitement in the country, owing to the want of proper knowledge upon the subject, and that the extra number of the report was necessary to enlighten the people.

MARCH 1, 1830.]

Indian Affairs.

[H. of R.]

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, said, he did not doubt but that the memorials were signed by many honest gentlemen, who erred for want of knowledge upon the subject. He did not object, when up before, to the expense of printing, but to the uselessness of the expense. Mr. T. made some remarks in reply to Mr. BURGESS, and concluded by saying he was not surprised at the course of the gentleman when he advocated remarks so indecorous, and so ungenerous to Georgia, as were contained in the memorial from the city of New York.

Mr. STERIGERE then moved to lay the motion to print upon the table.

Upon this motion, Mr. BATES called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the motion was rejected: yeas, 66—nays, 108.

The question then recurred upon the motion to print the memorials.

Mr. BELL said, it was due to the House that he should say a few words. He did not think the opposition to the printing arose from the supposition that it would throw light upon the general subject. He had stated before that he thought it ought not to be printed, unless all were printed. He understood the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] to place it upon the ground that, if all were printed, he did not object to the printing of this one. When the gentlemen examined the memorials, they would see that they were most of them before the public; some of them were in the papers before they reached the House. If any light was to be gained from them, the public was in possession. He alluded to the productions of "William Penn," upon which almost all the memorials were founded; the facts were the same, and the general reasoning was the same. He stated this, to repel the insinuations that the printing was opposed in order to withhold light. He thought the attention of the House should be drawn to this fact. His voice would not have been raised against this one, if he had known that a precedent had already been printed; and if such a motion had not been made, he now moved to print all the memorials at the same time this was printed.

Mr. BATES said, he agreed, if the House should print one and refuse to print the others, it would be invidious. There was not a single application to print a memorial, which was refused. The printing had not been refused, because it had not been asked for.

Mr. BUCHANAN hoped that his friend from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] would withdraw his motion to amend. Whenever this Indian question came before the House, it produced a strong excitement. For his own part, he was determined to keep himself perfectly cool, and consider it as he would any other important subject. A long and an animated debate had arisen upon the simple question of printing a memorial from the Society of Friends in New England. For his own part, ever since he had held a seat in that House, he had always voted for printing any memorial which the member who had presented thought it was proper to print, either for our own information or that of the public. He was anxious that all the light should be shed upon this subject, which we could obtain. But even if he were not so, he well knew that the attempt to prevent the printing of any memorial, served only the more to attract public attention to it, and thus give it an importance which it might not deserve. Had this motion to print prevailed, as it usually has done, without an objection, the memorial would have been quietly laid upon our tables; and there the matter would have ended. He had not read it; but, from the source from which it proceeded, it ought to be treated with respectful attention.

Mr. B. said, he could not vote for the amendment to print in mass all the memorials which had been presented to the House on the Indian question. It was wholly unnecessary. If any gentleman, however, should ask for the printing of any of them, upon his own responsibility, after having examined its contents, he should cheerfully vote with him. He would vote for printing this memorial, and trusted that the time of the House would not longer be occupied in discussing this very unimportant question.

Mr. GOODENOW said, he rose principally for information. There were in the House upwards of fifty memorials.

He understood that no part of these memorials would constitute a part of that report. If a memorial was presented, containing views different from any before advanced, only the day before the final question was taken, and if it was printed, he thought it was making an invidious distinction between that one and those which were filed away. If this motion did not prevail, he should move to print a memorial which he had himself presented.

Mr. HAYNES said, he was opposed to the printing, because it would have a tendency to keep up the delusion which existed in some parts of the country. A moment's consideration of the President's message would convince the people that it was not intended to do any thing more than to induce them voluntarily to emigrate. He had examined with some attention the legislation of Georgia on this subject. There was nothing in the acts of Georgia, which assumed the right to coerce the Indians to remove. It was only because he thought it would keep up a delusion that now existed.

Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, said, it was one of the things between the doing of which and the not doing of which was of so little consequence, that it was not worth speaking about. He had voted for laying it on the table, in the hope to get rid of it. He hoped it would be disposed of as courtesy should dictate, that the amendment would not prevail, and that the wishes of the gentleman who presented it should be acquiesced in.

Mr. BELL replied, that he submitted his amendment merely on the ground that it was said the opposition to the printing was to withhold information. If they were printed, the House would find them to contain very much the same matter.

Mr. BURGESS regretted extremely that he should have been misunderstood. He made a very ordinary motion to print a memorial from a respectable source. Gentlemen had accused him of making an insinuation. He did not know how to make an insinuation. He had all his life said, in as plain a manner as he could, the thing that he thought. With regard to previous remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. THOMPSON] he believed he had not used precisely the gentleman's words, but he thought he had not misrepresented them. The gentleman did not object to it on the ground of the expense, but because it was useless expense. Now, the uselessness of the printing was according to the judgment of the gentleman who made the objection.

As to his reverend appearance, it was not a matter of his own choice; whether he should have a gray hair or not, was not a matter in which he had a volition. He would say to that gentleman that he took no shelter behind his gray hairs from any fair argument. He allowed the servant boy to consider himself as reverend as he pleases. Though that gentleman's hair was now black, it might happen that a time would come when allusions to his age would sound ungracious in his ear.

He did think the motion to print them, en masse, was very much like an attempt to overthrow the whole. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] did say that the printing of the memorial would impugn the report. This the gentleman could not know, because he had not read this memorial. If it impugned the report, he would not ask for the printing of it. But if it impugned the principles of the report, he should ask to have it printed, for every one in the community had a right to impugn its premises and its conclusions. When he was up before, he was not aware that the gentleman from New Hampshire was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, or of course he should not have said the gentleman had not read the report. He was not bound to know that the gentleman belonged to the committee. As to this memorial from the Friends of New England, the men of peace, he thought it ought to be printed; and if it were not disrespectful to the House, he would say that he would himself pay the expense, which would not exceed one dollar and a half—of informing the House, and thus save the treasury from the onerous burden. The step about to be taken would change our whole policy in relation to the Indians, and decide whether we should purchase the land of the Indians, or expel them by force from the land of their forefathers.

Mr. GOODENOW made a few remarks in reply to Mr. BURGESS, and said he hoped the motion would prevail to amend; and, if it should not, he should vote for the motion of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he rose for the purpose of denying that the question to be hereafter decided by the House was of the character which had been stated by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS.] That gentleman had entirely mistaken its nature. He would not say the mistake was intentional, because he did not believe it was; but this he would say, that, unless it were corrected, it might do the same injury in misleading public opinion, as though it had been intended. Sir, [said Mr. B.] we are not about to decide, as the gentleman supposes, whether we shall change the settled policy of this country in regard to the Indians, nor whether we are about to expel them by force from the land of their forefathers. Far, very far from it. God forbid that I, or that any gentleman upon this floor, should entertain the cruel purpose of using the power of this Government to drive that unfortunate race of men by violence across the Mississippi. Where they are, there let them remain, unless they should freely consent to depart. The State of Georgia, so far as we can judge from her public acts, entertains no other intention.

The question may possibly be debated here, whether Georgia has a right to extend her laws over such Indians as reside within the limits of her sovereignty. That is a question, however, which will not either naturally or necessarily arise, upon the discussion of the bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

What is the nature of that bill? It presents the strongest inducements to the Indians to leave a land, in which, from the nature of things, they never can be happy, and rejoin that portion of their tribe which have already emigrated across the Mississippi. It proposes to them that they shall have a country and a home, guaranteed to them by the faith of the United States—by the most solemn pledges which the Government can make—where they shall be forever free from the intrusions of the white man—where, under the protection of the United States, they may be governed by their own laws and their own customs—and where the efforts of benevolence and christianity may be exerted for the purpose of elevating their moral and social condition.

And would not this be better for them, than to remain in a State, within the limits of which they have attempted to establish their own sovereign authority, in defiance of that State? Ought we not then to hold out inducements to them voluntarily to remove to this land of refuge? That is the question, and the only question which the bill will present.

Mr. BURGESS said, he intended to say may change the policy of the Government. The question referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs was, whether the Cherokees had a right to establish a Government within the boundary of Georgia. We have by solemn treaty guaranteed to the Indians their possession of the country, and the right to govern themselves in it. If the conclusion of that committee goes to show that the Indians have not the right to govern themselves, then our policy towards them is to be changed.

Mr. DE WITT here moved the previous question.

The main question was put on printing the memorial, and carried. Yeas, 106.

TUESDAY, MARCH 2, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. VINTON, to print, and append to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the laws of certain States extending their jurisdiction over the Indian tribes—the question being on Mr. FOSTER's substitute for the resolution, proposing to embrace the laws of all the States relative to the Indians within their limits.

Mr. BELL opposed the resolution as unnecessary to the extent proposed, and, if necessary to that extent, that there were other documents, treaties, &c. which it would be as proper to include.

Mr. TEST proposed to confine the selection to the original laws of the States extending their jurisdiction over the Indians.

Mr. FOSTER declined this modification, and supported his substitute as it stood.

Mr. STERIGERE moved to commit the resolution to the Committee on Indian Affairs. If the printing were ordered, as proposed, it would take all the summer to prepare the collection; and he thought the committee could better designate what was necessary.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, opposed the commitment, and advocated the original resolution, considering it essentially necessary that the House should be in possession of the acts in question, to be able to form an opinion on the questions which the House would be called on to decide at the present session, in relation to the Indians.

Mr. ELLSWORTH was also in favor of the original resolution. Memorials had been received from the Indians, complaining of the laws of those States as violating the treaties of legislation of the country; and it was necessary to have the laws printed, that the House might decide the justice of those complaints. It was useless to print the laws of States from which no complaints had been received.

Mr. HOFFMAN opposed the printing of the laws, and appending them to the report of the Indian Committee, because it would smother the report, and keep it from being read by the people. He was in favor of the commitment.

Mr. WILDE suggested the propriety of sending the resolution to the committee, with instructions to select and report so much of the laws, treaties, and judicial decisions of the several States, as they may deem proper to print for the information of the House, and advocated this course.

Mr. STERIGERE accepted the instructions as a part of his motion.

Mr. VINTON demanded the yeas and nays on the question; but just then the expiration of the hour cut off further proceeding for to-day.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. VINTON, on the subject of printing the laws of the several States in relation to the Indians within their territories, being on the amendment offered yesterday by Mr. WILDE, to recommit it with instructions to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On this amendment the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LUMPKIN said, in justification of the vote he should give, against referring this subject to the Committee on Indian Affairs, he would ask to be indulged with submitting, in a few words, the reasons of that vote. He was the more inclined to do so, from the consideration that he should vote differently from most of those with whom he generally acted upon this and other subjects. The report upon the Indian subject, already submitted by the committee, goes into detail, and presents their views of the subject in its various bearings. The various references contained in the report, to treaties, laws, and other documents, will prove that the committee have not been wanting in labor.

From the indications which have been exhibited on this floor, it is manifest that some individuals suspect the committee with having made a partial report, favorable in its bearing to one side of the question, omitting what should have been submitted on the other side. It must have been from such suspicions as these that the gentleman from Ohio, in the first instance, proposed his extraordinary appendage to the report of the committee. Admitting, as he did, the intelligence of the gentleman from Ohio, he would repeat his surprise that he should have so far departed from the well known custom of this House. If the member from Ohio had proposed simply the printing of the laws of any State or States, for the information of the House, the presumption is, no objection would have been made.

Mr. L. said, the committee had performed their duty, with how much ability it was not for him to say. He was content to leave that to others.

They had already submitted to the House all they deemed necessary and proper. Should they make a selection of the laws of the States, in conformity with the proposed instructions, no matter with how much fidelity and impartiality, they would again be liable to the censure of those who are disposed to suspect them of a partisan and one-sided spirit. The House understood the subject as well as the committee; whatever laws or other documents they might consider necessary to the elucidation of this subject, let them order it to be printed. Mr. L. said, as a member of this House, or that of a committee, he never would labor on responsibility. His motive in opposing this reference was not to avoid either; but, from a conviction that, when the committee had performed the duty proposed, the gentlemen who are not satisfied with the report of the committee, will be no better pleased with their selection of the laws of the States.

Mr. L. thanked the House for the respectful attention which he had uniformly received since he had the honor of a seat here; which consideration [he said] always admonished him not to consume a moment of the time of the House unnecessarily. He would therefore add no more, relying, as he did, on the wisdom of the House to give a proper direction to this subject.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, also gave his reasons for voting against the recommitment of the resolution. It would make a large volume. Such a task was almost impracticable. In the first place, all the laws are not here. It would be fitted to defeat the object. As for the laws of Georgia, he had been furnished with a newspaper containing them, and, therefore, for his individual use, he cared but little about them.

Mr. BURGESS also opposed the recommitment, on the ground that the printing of all the laws on this subject would so far protract the time, as to prevent its being acted upon during the present session, and it was understood that the laws of Georgia were to go into effect in June. He was about to state the effect of that law, by its giving the power to every officer in that State, down to a constable, to call out the militia—[when he was called to order, the question being only on the recommitting of the resolution, and not on the merits of the law of Georgia.] Mr. B. proceeded to show the effect of attaching all other laws to those proposed to be printed. It would overthrow the intention of the resolution, and he therefore should not vote for it.

Mr. POLK said, he hoped if any laws upon this subject were to be printed, all of them would be. He asked if Georgia was the only State to be arraigned there as having passed laws on this subject. He was in favor of the recommitment.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, rose to inquire how long it would take for the committee to arrange these laws for publication.

Mr. BELL said it would be difficult to answer the question. It would involve the committee in responsibilities which they would gladly avoid. He did not conceive that the laws of Georgia, Mississippi, and Alabama, had been referred to that committee. He hoped, if the gentleman would take the pains to modify his resolution, it would be framed so as to be satisfactory to all.

Mr. INGERSOLL said, he understood the President's message to refer particularly to the laws of Georgia, and those States which had lately passed laws upon the subject. It had been stated, and reiterated on that floor, that it was not the intention of the Government to compel the forcible removal of the Indians. This was the point at issue. He referred to the importance of having these laws in question before the House, in order that a proper judgment might be made on the subject.

Mr. GOODENOW said, it seemed to be dangerous that they should not come to any decision upon this subject, and he would therefore make a motion which would leave it open to debate as now, but, he believed, bring the question nearer to a close. He moved an indefinite postponement.

The SPEAKER informed Mr. G. that this was not a previous question.

Mr. GOODENOW then moved to lay the resolution on the table.

On this Mr. HUNTINGTON asked for the yeas and nays; but, the hour having expired, the subject was laid over.

The unfinished business of the day was laid over until Friday next.

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1830.

There was no debate of general interest this day.

FRIDAY, MARCH 5, 1830.

The House again resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. VINTON, proposing to print the laws of the States of Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi, concerning the Indians within them; and the motion of Mr. STERIGERE, to commit the same with instructions to the Committee on Indian Affairs; with the pending motion of Mr. GOODENOW, to lay the whole on the table.

The motion to lay the whole on the table was decided in the negative by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas, 68—nays, 108.

Mr. WILDE then rose to address the House, but the expiration of the hour for debating such subjects prevented him from proceeding.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the order moved by Mr. VINTON on the 25th February ultimo.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. STERIGERE on the 2d instant, to commit the said order to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with the instructions stated in the proceedings of the 2d instant: whereupon,

The said instructions were, on motion of Mr. WILDE, and by the consent of the mover, modified as follows: To collect from the Library of Congress, or any of the executive departments, such and so much of the colonial and State laws, as may there be found, respecting the government, privileges, restraints, protection, regulation, preservation, or destruction of Indians or Indian tribes, residing, or heretofore residing, within the several colonies or States, respectively; so much thereof as regards their lands or hunting grounds, their civil rights or disabilities, crimes committed, or contracts entered into by them; and the civil and criminal jurisdiction exercised by each colony or State over them—and to cause a sufficient number of copies of such laws, so collected, to be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. WILDE rose: The House, [he said] by the vote given yesterday on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GOONENOW] had indicated a disposition to print whatever might be requisite for a proper understanding of the subject. The gentleman's motion did not receive his vote, because he was desirous—sincerely desirous, to get this information. When he asked for a withdrawal of that motion, it was only for the purpose of stating a few facts. He fancied an erroneous impression prevailed in relation to the labor of collecting and the extent of printing these laws. The gentleman, however, as he had a perfect right to do, thought proper to press his motion—probably only to test the sense of the House, to whom it proved as unacceptable as it was to himself. It being now obvious that a majority was in favor of printing all or a part of the information sought for, the inquiry was, how our object could be most easily and speedily effected. He had had an opportunity of reflecting on this point. He had the advantage of some conversation, too, with gentlemen for whose opinions he entertained great respect. He intended to propose a slight change in the instructions, and would detain the House with a word or two in explanation.

He omitted altogether the treaties included in his former proposition. He had inserted them then, rather in deference to what he had imagined had fallen from the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. BELL] than for any other reason. These treaties, up to 1826, had been compiled and printed by order of the War Department. They were easily accessible to every one. Further reflection had satisfied him it would not be necessary to include them, and, in that opinion, he believed he might assume the gentleman himself concurred.

He [Mr. W.] had originally proposed to print a portion of the judicial decisions of the States, leaving it to the committee to select. Perhaps he owed some of the opposition his motion met with to that cause. He was unwilling, without strong reasons, to increase the labor or responsibility of the committee. This must be the case if they were required to abridge the decisions. To print them entire might impair the value of the collection, by increasing its bulk. On the whole, therefore, it had been thought best to omit judicial decisions. The committee, then, if the motion were adopted, would only be required to select the State and colonial laws, and of these there would be printed merely a sufficient number for the use of the House.

He had employed an hour in examining the State laws to be found in the library. The result of that examination induced him to believe that the laws of fifteen of the States, which had legislated most in detail for the Indians, would not occupy more than sixty-three pages, printing them entire. If abbreviated, as they well might be, not so much. Every gentleman, on looking at them, would admit there were many minute, local, or temporary provisions, that might be safely excluded. In the digests of the remaining nine States, little or nothing was to be found. Their statute books, or old colonial acts, might contain a few laws or parts of laws proper to be extracted. Assuming, however, that these nine States had legislated to an extent equal to an average of the others, ninety-five or a hundred pages would include the whole.

The time and labor required for this purpose could not be much. The expense, compared with the object, was nothing. No gentleman, he believed, would deem it worthy a moment's consideration. We printed yearly much larger documents on less important subjects. He might instance many. The claims of the Massachusetts militia—those concerning French spoiliations—those of Meade and Beaumarchais—and, that he might not be thought to discriminate invidiously, he would add, the claims of Georgia and South Carolina. He mentioned all these merely and purely as examples. He indicated no feeling of disapprobation. They were all, doubtless, proper to be printed.

In proposing to limit the inquiries of the committee to the Library of Congress and Department of State, he did not design to exclude light from any other quarter. He did it wholly in deference to the fears of gentlemen who apprehended delay, and the great evil of a great book. Both he most earnestly desired to avoid. Some acts might not, some old colonial ones probably would not, be found there; but, if so, gentlemen would no doubt supply any that might be deemed important. They would at least be discovered, and referred to in debate. Enough certainly might be collected to exhibit the general tone and character of legislation adopted by each State and colony. He thought knowledge of this kind would not be found useless. If it answered no other purpose, it might teach us forbearance. It was well said, that the first idea of justice arose from hard knocks between equal adversaries; of toleration, it might be added, from mutual intolerance. Perhaps when gentlemen saw before them the legislation of all the colonies and States—when they saw and knew that others must see likewise whatever had been done—recently by their countrymen, or in times past by their forefathers—it would occur to them that a community of errors might well authorize the indulgence of a little mutual charity. Some allowance would probably be made for strong interests and excited passions, among people who had suffered much from savage violence, if it should be found that different societies, at distant periods, in separate provinces, had each acted on common maxims, adopted a similar policy, and treated the same subject in like manner, and with the same feelings. He did not mean to intimate that examples the most venerable could consecrate a wrong. Still less that any portion of our fellow-citizens were to be reproached with the sins of their fathers, if sins they had committed. God forbid that he should reflect on the memory of those brave, but somewhat stern—honest, though bitter zealots in the cause of civil and religious freedom, who, though persecuted themselves, could hardly tolerate toleration; and who, suffering every thing for conscience' sake, endured the perils, and hardships, and privations of the wilderness, that they, and their children, and their children's children, might escape the house of bondage. All he meant to say was this: If his countrymen were impatient of the long continued presence of their savage neighbors, and sometimes struggled with them in the unamiable and unchristian interchange of wrong for wrong, it might extenuate their restlessness to remember that men more patient had also, in their day and generation, been sorely moved to wrath by the cruel and wicked craft of the red heathen.

Mr. W. said, there was a further suggestion he felt bound to make. We are told, we must examine the laws of Georgia, Mississippi, and Alabama. They must be printed. And why? Not to ascertain whether those States have a right to legislate over the Indians. No. It is admitted, the right to legislate does not depend on the mode in which it may be exercised. But our course, it is alleged, should be shaped to meet the character of their legislation. We must inquire whether it is such as, in its effects, will compel the Indians to remove. And why, then, is our inquest to be confined to Georgia, or Alabama, or Mississippi? The petitions and memorials of the various religious societies, public meetings, and benevolent ladies, are general in their terms. Why should we attempt to limit the operation of their disinterested and expansive philanthropy? The bill reported by the committee is general. It is intended to provide, beyond the Mississippi, a permanent home, subsistence, comfort, and the means of improvement, for such of the Indians as think proper to remove. Not to force them from their present abodes, nor to set them down in the wilderness to starve. What, then, limits our views to the Indians within the territory of Georgia, or that territory which was once hers? Are we to have no feeling, but for one set of paupers, whom we are advised, in the teeth of our own contract, to settle, not at our expense, upon another parish? If the legislation of any other State, besides those favored with the presence of the Creeks and Cherokees, operates hardly or oppressively on other Indians, may we not inquire whether the acts of that State are not calculated in their effects to degrade, or compel them to remove? What excludes those Indians from our pity, or the legislation of that State from our cognizance? But the Indians of other States have not complained. And have the Choctaws or Chickasaws complained?

The merit of his proposition, if merit it had, was, that it would lay open all the information we could desire. It comprehended all laws, all States, and all Indians. It made no invidious distinctions—none that could ever be considered such.

No gentleman had avowed an unwillingness to see the laws of his own State printed, scrutinized, and canvassed. He presumed—it was his duty to presume—he took pleasure in presuming, no such unwillingness existed. For his own part, he most explicitly disavowed it. There was, there should be, no room for doubt, as to him. Every gentleman would see, with pride and pleasure, whatever was wise and humane in the legislation of the State he represented; whatever seemed otherwise, he could doubtless justify, explain, or excuse. But it could not be requisite for the information of any one there, that the laws of his own State should be presented to him. All, he supposed, knew, and many of the members, he believed, were professionally skilled in the laws of their respective States. With those of others, it could hardly be assumed they were more than generally, and somewhat superficially acquainted. It was the laws of States other than his own, then, that every gentleman most desired to see. And for the same reason that gentlemen from Ohio, and Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, wished to look into the laws of Georgia, and Mississippi, and Alabama gentlemen from Mississippi, and Alabama, and Georgia, might like to see the laws of Ohio, and Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. For himself, he confessed an anxiety to behold that paternal or patriarchal code, (if there were any such,) under whose shade numerous and warlike tribes, such as the Pequods, the Mohigans, or the Narragansetts, had survived in peace as independent nations, or gradually and harmoniously blended with the family of their white brethren.

Those States, under whose benign protection and legislation the Indians had increased, flourished, been civilized and converted, could not be unwilling to enjoy the honorable fame of such noble and generous actions, except from an excess of christian humility. To that rare and holy feeling, wheresoever it existed, he now, and at all times, did profound reverence; not with his lips merely, but he hoped with his heart also. But in this instance, if it were necessary, for the sake of great public interests, he trusted the House would do gentle violence to the retiring spirit which concealed its charities. Surely, when so pressed, it would not withhold from others the benefit of its example, or a knowledge of the means by which such great additions had been made to the sum of human happiness.

Those States would impart their lessons and experience, and others, who had been less fortunate or less zealous, might, if it were not too late, attend and profit by them. Gentlemen might be found there, willing to transmit to the legislatures and people of their States whatever might be found worthy of imitation, in those beneficent provisions which had protected, so effectually, the Norridgewocks, the Scatecorks, the Orondocks, and the Pigwackets. His countrymen, he trusted, were not envious or fastidious. If an example were good, they would not ask who set it. Its value was the same, whether it came from the pious pilgrims of the East, or the hardy pioneers of the West. From the practice of either, they would be glad to learn how the progress of the white, and preservation and happiness of the red men, might be reconciled.

[Here the SPEAKER reminded Mr. W. that his remarks were taking too wide a range.]

Mr. W. continued: He was proceeding to show some of the advantages which might result from the adoption of his motion. If they were too numerous, or he had pursued them further than was agreeable to any gentleman there, or beyond the usual license of debate, he regretted it. He had listened without impatience, while other gentlemen discussed this matter with much zeal and some freedom. Originally he did little more than state his proposition. Nothing till now had induced him to reply. It was not his custom to trouble the House long or often. He would rather be tasked for silence than checked for speech; but when he saw his motion in danger both from friends and adversaries, he was bound to offer it his feeble assistance. He had so shaped it now, in deference to the opinions of others, as to secure its principal advantages, and expose it to less opposition. His colleague, [Mr. LUMPKIN] in particular, he trusted, would no longer oppose it. His object principally had been to show how little trouble and how little printing it would cost. We had been threatened by gentleman with a huge volume, if his motion were adopted. A small pamphlet would be found sufficient. He had no affection for ponderous tomes of any kind, not even those on Indian laws or treaties. He believed, with Goldsmith, if angels should write books, they would never write folios. The recorded speeches, too, of those heavenly visitants were few and short. In that they differed from all mortal eloquence, saintly and profane. He hoped that every gentleman who desired to address the House, had now fully expressed his opinions of the motion. He hoped it would prevail. He hoped the laws would be speedily collected and printed; and that they would proceed promptly, but calmly, to a consideration of the main subject, with that temper which became matter of great moment, supposed to involve so deeply the rights of the States, the welfare of the Indians, the character of that House, and the honor of the nation.

Mr. GOODENOW rose to explain why he did not withdraw his motion yesterday to lay the whole on the table, when the gentleman who had just addressed the House intimated his desire to speak. It would have given him great pleasure to have done so, and he should have done so had he been aware that the gentleman was going to communicate to the House the information he has now given. My object [said Mr. G.] was to save time, and to enable us to act upon this subject immediately; it is important it should be acted upon, and not passed over this session. Mr. G. said he wished the question to be presented in its best possible view.

Mr. SPENCER said, it was never his object to shut out any light which was considered for the decision of a question. He expressed his concurrence in the proposition now made, and he hoped it would be adopted without further debate.

Mr. LUMPKIN said, that, having opposed the former project of his colleague, [Mr. WILDS] and believing that this was different from it, and calculated to accomplish the object he had, he would vote for it. The former proposition required the committee to print the laws of all the States relating to this subject—the legal decisions connected with it; and to examine, also, the decisions of the Supreme Court. That would make the duties of the committee too laborious, and so tedious that it would protract the object to a period at which we could not have time to act upon it. I concur in the proposition, [said Mr. L.] and I hope the House will concur in it without further discussion.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, inquired of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE] whether this amendment would include the laws of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, for the last two or three years. These were the only laws needed to enable the House to act on the bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs. He said that the laws were not punctually received at the library.

Mr. WILDE replied, that if the laws referred to in his proposition were not in the library, they might probably be in the Secretary of State's office. It was with this view he worded his amendment. If it was not sufficiently explicit, he was willing to modify it, so as to meet the views of gentlemen.

Mr. EVERETT thought that they would be more probably found in the office of the Secretary of War, or, in the Indian bureau, than in the office of the Secretary of State. He suggested so to modify the amendment that it would embrace "in any of the offices of the public departments."

This modification was accepted by Mr. WILDE.

Mr. BURGESS said he would be glad, for the sake of history, that all the laws of the several States having relation to the Indian tribes residing within them should be printed. But his object, in the present instance, was to see the laws of those States which brought us to a consideration of this question. He wished to see the laws of the Southern States, which were before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and upon which the committee has reported. We have not seen these laws, and he hoped they would be all printed as soon as possible.

Mr. B. then went on to consider the amendment proposed by Mr. WILDE. It includes [said he] the judicial decisions made on the subject of the Indians. We do not want them; and, if we did, it would be impossible for the committee to select and have them printed in any reasonable time. No historian would dare to make such a compilation in less than six months' research. As to the laws mentioned in this proposition, no one knows where they are to be found. He hoped, therefore, that the committee would not be delayed in this antiquarian research.

Mr. B. then proceeded to show the dissimilarity which existed between the relations of the Northern and the Southern States to the Indians residing within them, respectively. With the Indian tribes who resided in the Northern States, no treaties have ever been made, yet a remnant of them still reside there. What relation, then, what connexion, [he asked] had their situation with that of the Indian tribes residing in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi?

The SPEAKER here informed Mr. B. that the hour for considering resolutions, &c. had elapsed. He then discontinued his remarks.

MONDAY, MARCH 8, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. VINTON'S motion to print the acts of Georgia, &c. relating to the Indians—the question being on Mr. STERIGERE'S motion to commit the resolution, with the instructions moved by Mr. WILDE.

Mr. BURGESS concluded the speech he commenced on Saturday on the subject, and was replied to by Mr. BELL and Mr. HAYNES. On the suggestion of Mr. BELL, the instructions were modified, so as to omit the word "destruction," and substitute "restraint."

The question was then taken on the motion to commit the resolution, with the proposed instructions, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—133 to 49.

TUESDAY, MARCH 9, 1830.

THE JUDICIARY.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the Judiciary bill.

Mr. WICKLIFFE took the floor, and addressed the committee until the usual hour of adjournment, when the committee rose.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 10, 1830.

Mr. ANDERSON moved the following resolution, viz.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill allowing a drawback of nine cents per gallon on all rum distilled in this country from foreign molasses, when such rum is exported to a foreign country.

Mr. ANDERSON accompanied his motion with remarks in its explanation and support, which he had not concluded when the expiration of the hour interrupted him.

JUDICIARY BILL.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the Judiciary bill.

Mr. WICKLIFFE addressed the committee in continuation of his remarks of yesterday; and, when he concluded, Mr. SPENCER, of New York, rose, and spoke in reply.

Mr. DANIEL then renewed his motion to amend the bill in the manner heretofore proposed by him. When the amendment was read by the Clerk,

The committee, on the motion of Mr. DANIEL, rose, reported progress, and asked and obtained leave to sit again.

[The following is a full report of the remarks of Mr. WICKLIFFE.]

The bill under consideration [said Mr. W.] is admitted, by all who have participated in the debate, to be of vital importance to the Union. It proposes to extend the judiciary system of the United States to that portion of this confederacy, which, under its present organization, is excluded from all participation in that important department of our Government. To do this, it is believed to be necessary to increase the number of the justices of the Supreme Court. If the subject does not of itself possess sufficient interest; if the able and talented gentlemen who have already favored the committee with their views, have not been able to impart to it importance sufficient to elicit the attention of the members, whose duty it will be soon to decide upon it, I despair of success in any effort of mine.

But, sir, I owe a duty to my constituents, to myself, as a member of the judiciary committee, and to that committee, which I must discharge, however unsatisfactory to myself, or painful to those who honor me with their attention.

Sir, this is no new subject thrown upon this House, it is no innovation upon the established institutions of our country. It is one to which the deliberations of every Congress for the last ten years have been invited, by the messages of three successive Presidents of the United States. It is not connected with the party politics of the day, and should be discussed and decided, with reference to the question itself, as one worthy of a liberal and enlightened judgment.

The constitution vests the judicial power of the United States in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress, from time to time, may ordain and establish. Whatever inferior courts Congress shall ordain and establish, should alike extend themselves to the whole Union. The system should be one system for all the States, uniform in its character, and harmonious in its action.

At the commencement of the Government, uniformity in the organization of the judiciary department was preserved throughout the then thirteen States; and, in every change of the system since made, uniformity has been sedulously preserved.

For a moment allow me to call your attention to the history of the judicial system of the United States, as illustrative of what I have said upon this subject:

In 1789, Congress, in obedience to the mandate of the constitution, organized the Supreme Court, and established the district and circuit courts in the several States, and imparted to them severally most of that jurisdiction which they have since exercised. A district and a circuit court was established in each State, and the Supreme Court was constituted of six justices. The Union was divided into three circuits, the eastern, middle, and southern circuits. Two of the justices of the Supreme Court were required to hold, jointly, two terms in each year, in each of the States, besides two terms of the Supreme Court, at the seat of Government. In 1792, the justices themselves, in a memorial to the President of the United States, complained of the onerous duties exacted of them under the act of 1789, and declared their inability to perform the labor which that act imposed upon them. This memorial was made the subject of Executive communication to Congress, and, in that year, instead of three circuits, six were created, and one justice of the Supreme Court was required, in conjunction with the district judge, to hold the circuit courts in each State, twice in each year.

At that time, sir, our population did not exceed six millions; our Union was composed of thirteen States; the banks of the Ohio formed, in fact, our western boundary. The Congress of 1789 did not then think six judges of the Supreme Court were more than necessary to the discharge of the high duties confided by the constitution and laws to that tribunal. The judges themselves, and the Congress of 1792, believed that the duties imposed by the judiciary act of 1789 were too onerous; and they divided the labor of the circuit duties. From that day to this I have never understood that those justices had not enough to do. Indeed, I have often heard it said they had more labor to perform than they could well discharge, in justice to themselves and to the country. Now, sir, when the number of States has nearly doubled; when our population has increased from six to twelve millions; when our commerce has extended itself to every country and clime; our relations as political communities have increased in importance, and every day becoming more and more delicate; the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAWFORD] is ready to start these judges upon a judicial race over twenty-four States twice in each year. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER] conscious that his friend from Pennsylvania has exacted more than human labor can accomplish, stops the judges at the limits of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and proposes to give to these States a provincial judge, a judge with full and ample salary, but he is not permitted to take his seat upon the Supreme Bench, that is, the judicial sanctum sanctorum, which must not be contaminated by a western man. The one proposition is, of itself, utterly hopeless of success, and the other cannot be regarded, though not so intended, but as an insult to the States who are thus marked by the exclusion alone as applicable to themselves. A system something like this of the gentleman from New York, was reported by the judiciary committee, in 1823. That system, however, allowed the provincial justices, when it should please God to remove by death any of the then justices of the Supreme Court, to take the place thus vacated. It met with one universal condemnation from the nine western States, and was by the committee abandoned, as utterly offensive to those whom it proposed to benefit. Such, I have no doubt, will be the fate of so much of the amendment of the gentleman from New York as proposes to send to these three proud and gallant States a provincial judge.

I proceed, sir, with the history from which I have been diverted in a moment's reply to a part of the opposition to the bill under consideration.

The system remained under the organization of 1792, until that eventful period in the political history of our country, the month of February, 1801. The party then in power, but which was soon to retire, under the indignant frowns of an insulted and abused people, looked to the judicial department of our Government as a point of safe retreat—a point from which they could renew their assaults upon their conquerors, the people; and succeed in establishing principles in our Government, which the constitution did not warrant, and which the people abhorred.

In that year, the judicial system of the United States was changed. The Supreme Court was to consist of the six justices then in commission, to discharge appellate duties only. Thus separated from the States, and the people of the States, the judges were destined to become the mere engines of power, devoted to the establishment of a great consolidated government, and regarding the States as mere corporate existences, deriving their power from, instead of imparting it to, the General Government.

The better to effect this grand purpose, six circuits were enacted, and three circuit judges in each circuit were appointed, besides the district judges then in commission.

It will only be necessary to look to the then state of the times, and to the names of such judges as were commissioned, some in the hour of midnight, to justify the inferences which I have made.

This system did not require the test of experience to satisfy the American people of its enormity—its want of adaptation to the system of government, such as the Union was and ought to be; and so soon as they could lay their hands upon it, they erased this federal citadel to the foundation, and rebuilt that of 1789.

Between 1789 and 1807, Vermont, Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee had been admitted into the Union, and, in the latter year, (1807,) a seventh justice was added to the Supreme Court, to reside in the seventh circuit, and to hold circuit courts in the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Vermont was added to the eastern circuit; and thus the system of 1789 was made to expand itself, and to embrace these four new States, and has continued from that time to the present moment.

It has given to our nation a character, at home and abroad, for judicial intelligence and weight of character, which the gentlemen opposed to this bill have been emulous of each other in praising.

I will not detract from the just claims of our national judiciary, nor will I speak of it irreverently.

I have no incense to burn at the altar of any department of this Government; and if I had, it would not burn at that of the judiciary.

That department, like every other, is filled by men liable to err, and responsible to the people, whom I regard as the supreme power in this Government. To them and to their will I acknowledge my obligations; and, in the execution of that will, as their representative, I will speak of the other co-ordinate departments of their Government as I think they deserve.

This is in theory, and should be in practice, a representative Government, in all its departments. The Executive, in his appropriate sphere, is no less the agent or representative of the people, than the members of this House, though his functions are different. The judges must be regarded as the agents or representatives of the people, in the discharge of their functions in the judicial department of this Government.

The doctrine which repudiates the idea of representation in the judicial department, is anti-republican, is at war with the genius of our institutions.

Gentlemen startle at the idea of judicial representation, and say they do not comprehend it. If they do, they have not dealt fairly by those who believe that there ought to exist in that, as in every other department, the representative principle.

The member from New York [Mr. STRONG] seems to be astounded at its mention. He never before heard of the idea of "judicial representation." In his mind, it must mean, if I have his words correctly, the representation of the prejudices, the passions, and the factions of the people. There is a class of politicians in this country, who have always, when speaking of the people, supposed them to be governed alone by prejudice, passion, and faction. I will not say that the gentleman belongs to that class, but he will pardon me for entertaining an opinion more favorable of the intelligence and virtue of the people. They are capable of thinking, reasoning, and acting, free from prejudice or passion.

The other gentleman from New York [Mr. SPENCER] repudiates, in strong terms, as wholly improper, the idea of preserving in our judicial department the representative principle. Indeed, he seems to go further upon this subject than his colleague. He would have the judge unknown to the people, and the people unacquainted with the judge. He would have the judge, in order to preserve him from the contaminating influence of the people among whom he is to administer the laws, reside as far as possible from them, to be sent among them at a distance from where he resides.

If these views be sound, if there be any thing in them consistent with propriety, and in harmony with the principles of our Government, it would be well to test them by experiment. Let us disband our own judicial corps, and call upon the chancellor of England, the judges of the courts of King's bench and common pleas, to visit us, and decide upon the rights and liberties of our citizens. They would be as likely as any set of men, if not the most so, to preserve untarnished the new and pre-eminent qualification of a judge, a total ignorance of the people of the United States, and consequently the genius and spirit of their institutions, which depend upon public opinion for their excellence and pre-eminence of character.

For my own part, I am wholly averse to the idea of importing judges as we import our cattle, under the hope of improving their breed.

When my rights are involved in a judicial contest, I like to know something of the men who are about to decide upon them. When a judge is known to the people among whom and for whom he administers justice, to be a man of high character, undoubted integrity, and legal attainments, his decisions give satisfaction, and inspire confidence in the public mind. Not so with a judge of whom the people know nothing.

I will tell the gentlemen what I understand by judicial representation.

In the first place, as this is a representative republic, I would not have upon the bench a monarchist in principle. I would have the judges responsible to the people; and, if I were about to form a constitution, I would limit the term of their office, and remit them to the appointing power, at stated periods.

To come to the question now under discussion: In the organization of a court, such as that of the Union, whose jurisdiction is defined by the constitution of the United States, whose powers are co-extensive with the boundaries of twenty-four distinct and sovereign States, the same system should be extended to each State. In making the appointments to office, I would look to the various geographical divisions of these sovereign communities, and I would make the selections from among the citizens of those States, with a view to give to each its due and relative proportion and weight in the judicial department. To illustrate my idea, I would extend the present judicial system to those six, I might say nine States, to which it has not been extended. I would give to those States, when divided into proper circuits, a judge selected from among the citizens of those States, to reside within the respective circuits, and administer justice in the inferior courts, and to repair, once in each year, to the seat of Government, bringing with them each a knowledge of the local laws and judicial decisions of the respective States, and, if gentlemen will have it so, possessing, in common with the people, those principles of government, and attachments to our institutions, so necessary to make a man either a good politician or a sound judge.

To illustrate my idea of judicial representation further, I need only advert to the fact that your court is now composed of seven judges—six of whom reside on this side the mountains, and administer justice in courts of original jurisdiction in States containing a population of about seven millions, while nine States, with a population little short of five millions, is left with but a single judge, and he confined to three out of the nine States.

If the honorable gentleman will, for the sake of the argument, imagine the entire vacancy of the Supreme Bench, and that the President would be weak or wicked enough to appoint the whole seven from the State of Kentucky or Ohio, and the Congress of the United States unjust enough to say, by its legislation, that, in the six New England States, and in the "great State" of New York, there should not be held a circuit court, they will then have a just conception of my idea of judicial representation. My word for it, sir, if that were the case, and it were necessary to extend the system to these States, to increase the number of judges to nine or ten, this bill would pass.

I put it to the candor of gentlemen to say, if it is consistent with their own notions of equality in the States, with their own notions of justice to the people west of the Alleghany, that the present system, limited as it is, shall remain when these States, in their sovereign character, present their high claims to the Congress of the United States, demanding the extension of this system to them, and claiming, as they have a right to claim, an equal participation in the administration of this Government in all its departments.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HUNTINGTON] has informed us, that the complaint of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, is not that their business is not done, but that it is not as well done as in the other States; that there is no business in the new States to justify the extension of the system; and he has resorted to the docket of the Supreme Court to ascertain the number of appeals there depending, in order to ascertain the number of causes annually instituted in those States. The gentleman must be aware that this species of evidence is not entitled to weight, and does not justify the conclusion to which it has conducted his mind. He has, however, found some causes from all of those States, and, therefore, is forced to admit that there are some causes instituted and tried in the district courts of those States.

If, however, he had extended his examination of that docket, he would have discovered that from his own State (Connecticut) there was not a single appeal depending in the Supreme Court; and he would not be willing to assert, on this floor or elsewhere, that there was no judicial business in the circuit court of that State, or that there was no necessity for a court of the United States to sit in Connecticut.

If the gentleman had been familiar with another fact, that in the new States the amount in controversy in each suit is seldom equal to two thousand dollars, which is necessary to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction, he would have at once perceived the reason why a greater number of appeals are not annually pending in that court from the new States. From this circumstance, too, he might have seen the greater necessity of affording to the litigants in those States the security to private rights derived from having the opinion of a court composed of two judges instead of one.

The Judiciary Bill.

[H. of R.]

But the gentleman has another reason why he will not extend the system to the new States, and that is, because there are no petitions presented to Congress, requesting the extension. Sir, I will say to the gentleman, the Western people are not a petitioning people. They look to their representatives on this floor to express their wants and feelings, not in the tone of humble petitioners, but in the higher language of demand and remonstrance. And when he hears from the true representatives of those States, he will hear but one voice, and that will be, the States and the people of those States demand the passage of the bill on your table.

Upon this subject, however, the Western States and the people of those States, feeling the manifest injustice which has so long been done them, have not been silent; they have, by memorials from their Legislatures, and by the people, demanded of the Congress of the United States the extension of the present judicial system to them. They desire no change, no alteration of the system, but require that it shall be made to embrace them in its practical operation, and that their full relative weight, as component parts of this confederacy, may be felt in the judicial, as it is felt in every other department of your Government.

Sir, I hold in my hand memorials from the Legislatures of Alabama, Tennessee, and Indiana, and from the citizens of some of those States, presenting, in strong and bold terms, the grievances under which they are placed by the present arrangement of the courts of the United States, and demanding, as an act of justice, that they be placed upon the footing of equality with the other States in this Union. I will not detain the committee by reading any of them. I will hand them over to the gentleman from Connecticut, and, after he shall have read them, I am persuaded he will waive this objection to the bill.

The gentleman is forced to admit, that, "if he believed there was as much business in Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee now, as there was in 1826, he would give the relief asked." If the business have diminished one half, which I undertake to state is not the case, relief is necessary, and no judge can discharge his duties in that circuit and in the Supreme Court, with satisfaction to the public and to himself.

I am firmly persuaded that the labors imposed upon the judge of that district murdered Judge Todd, if they did not in some degree contribute to the death of Judge Trimble. The gentleman is wholly misinformed, when he states to this House that the business in Kentucky will not require more than four weeks during the year. He tells us that land litigation is done in Kentucky. I wish I could hear that from higher authority—the Supreme Court of the Union. The assertion of the gentleman depends mainly for its accuracy upon the decision of one question, now pending in the Supreme Court, and which I have been anxiously watching for years past, determined to defend, to the extent of my poor feeble powers, the right of my State to prescribe, by legislation, a limitation to suits for land in her territory, which right is denied by those interested in prostrating what is known there as our "seven years law." If that law shall fall by the fiat of this august tribunal, the floodgates of litigation will be again hoisted, and misery and affliction incalculable will be poured on that devoted State, and her youngest son will not survive their effects. The delay in the trial of causes in that court has led to losses, disappointments, and exactions upon the honest occupants, of which but few have a just conception.

Vol. VI.—76

If there be one obligation paramount to another upon a government, it is, a speedy and sound administration of justice. This we have not heretofore had in the Western States, and we have felt the baneful effects of it.

The member from Connecticut, as also the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, have taken occasion, in this debate, to allude to the relief laws of Kentucky, and said the State court had declared them to be constitutional, and the United States' court had given a contrary decision. From this erroneous assumption of fact they have predicated the charge, that the public had lost confidence in the State tribunal; consequently, the docket of the United States' circuit court of that State had been greatly increased. Though it is not necessary for my argument to correct the statement, I could not feel that I had discharged my duty, as one of her representatives, if I passed over this uncalled for allusion by the gentlemen to the internal policy of the State of Kentucky. The fact is directly the reverse of what the gentlemen state it to be. I state the fact, that the court of Kentucky decided some of the relief laws unconstitutional; the Supreme Court never did. This relief system, Mr. Chairman, was a domestic, a family quarrel, well understood in the State, but not understood out of it.

The gentleman from Connecticut will perhaps be surprised when I tell him that he has now in his own State a much worse and more outrageously unjust law, upon the subject of collecting debts, than we ever had at any time in Kentucky. At a time of great pecuniary distress, produced by the revulsion in trade, the destruction of a foreign market by the universal pacification of Europe, the depreciation in the value of estates, the want of a circulating medium, the Legislature of Kentucky, believing they had the power, and that it was expedient to exercise it, enacted certain laws, the object and the effect of which were, to prevent the sacrifice of the property of the country, by instantaneous and unlimited sales under execution. The debtor had a right, by giving good security, to replevy his debt for two years; if he was unable to give this security, his estate was to be sold upon a credit of two years. His land was to be valued by men appointed by the court; and if it would sell for two-thirds of its value thus ascertained under execution, it was directed to be sold for the money, to pay the debt. These, sir, are the principal features of this relief system. I was not its advocate at home; but I will compare it here with the system in the gentleman's own State, and claim for it a pre-eminence.

In Connecticut, sir, and indeed in most of the New England States, that land of steady habits, they have a law now in force, by virtue of which a debtor defendant in execution has the right "to set off his land against the execution." I believe the phrase is, and it is done in this way; men are called upon to value the land of the debtor, and the plaintiff is obliged to take the land in satisfaction of the execution, at its full price; the officer has no right to sell it; the plaintiff must take the land or nothing. [Here Mr. HUNTINGTON remarked, that if he did not choose to take the land at the appraised value, the plaintiff could issue a ca. sa. against, and take the body of the defendant.] Mr. WICKLIFFE continued: Worse still, Mr. Chairman. In Kentucky, thank God, no man's body can be seized at the will of his creditor, and incarcerated for debt: that is, of all others, the poorest discharge of a judgment; it does no good to the creditor, and often inflicts misery and ruin upon the debtor and his unoffending family.

To satisfy the members of this committee that the Western States do not demand too much by this bill, I have availed myself of the statistics of a member of this House in 1826, which, with some slight modification I have made, I adopt as my own, and believe them in the main correct. It will furnish us with some accurate information of the labor then performed by the judges, and that which they will have to perform if the bill passes; and I am sure no gentleman would desire to increase the quantum now imposed, if any credit be due to the following table:

CIRCUITS.	Population.	No. of Suits for 1826.	Travel to Circuit Court.	To Supreme Court.	Total Mileage.
1st.
Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, 2d.	1,148,842	130	940	1000	1940
Vermont, Connecticut, New York, 3d.	1,883,820	130	1000	500	1500
New Jersey, Pennsylvania, 4th.	1,327,035	110	400	500	900
Delaware, Maryland, 5th.	480,730	57	420	30	450
Virginia, North Carolina, 6th.	1,704,195	70	750	250	1000
South Carolina, Georgia, 7th.	843,730	100	550	1400	1950
Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee,	1,568,534	1700	1200	1400	2600

This exhibits the labor of the judges under the present system. If there be added, as I believe there should, three justices, the following will exhibit the labor in the three new circuits:

7th.
Kentucky, Ohio,	900,000	1200	700	1400	2100
8th.
Tennessee, Alabama,	550,714	500	2500	1200	3700

Louisiana, Mississippi,	228,855	120	2100	2000	4100
10th.
Missouri, Indiana, Illinois,	490,000	290	800	8100	2600

Here, sir, is labor enough for ten judges, and still the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHAWFORD] under his system, would impose the whole of it upon the present judges, most of whom are far advanced in years. If I desired to deprive the country of the services of the present judges, I would adopt the plan of the gentleman, for I am sure those who did not resign would ere long share the fate of the lamented Todd.

I will not consume more of your time, to convince you that the addition of at least two, I say three, justices is necessary to the discharge of the business in the nine Western States. All admit that the system ought to be extended to them in some form or shape. I prefer the present system, so do the people West; and if we cannot have it extended by the addition of two or three justices now, we will sooner "bear the ills we have, than fly to others we know not of." We will prefer to remain excluded the judicial pale, rather than be forced to adopt the system of 1801. We view our present wrongs as local to the States;

but a resuscitation of the midnight judiciary act would, in our opinion, be a national calamity affecting our whole Union.

And allow me to say to my Western friends, whose constituents labor under the present temporary evils, not to yield to the repeated attempts which are making, to fasten the system of 1801 upon the nation, under pretence that it is made necessary to do so, in order to accommodate the Western States. Be patient; another census will enable the Valley of the Mississippi to speak in a voice, on this floor, which will be felt in the councils of the nation; and that which cannot now be procured by the voice of reason, will be obtained by the eloquence of members, which I find at last is the most powerful here as well as elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman, it must be manifest that the present number of judges is not equal to the discharge of the business in the several States, and to the discharge of their duties as an appellate tribunal.

It is evident that nine States of this Union have just claims upon us, which we cannot deny; we may evade them by sophistry, and unjustly postpone them.

This committee have decided, by the rejection of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPOONER] that they will not change the present system of our courts. The Congress of the United States have heretofore refused to change it. The people will not consent to a change, by which there shall be an appellate court here, composed of judges who are not required to discharge circuit court duties.

The present system, by which the justices of the Supreme Court are required to visit the several States, and to perform circuit duties by holding courts of original jurisdiction, has been tested by the experience of forty years, and that of itself is a sufficient reason why it should not now be abandoned. My rule in public and private life is, "to let well enough alone."

But, sir, I believe the present system is best, to ensure public and private confidence in the judiciary. The people wish to know something of the functionaries in this department. When they know them, and witness their acts in the administration of justice in the States, recognise them as citizens of the States, though in the discharge of official duties as officers of the United States, confidence is infused in the public mind, and the opinions of a judge, known and respected by the people for his private and public virtues, will always be respected and obeyed. It will not be the case if we call these judges from the States, and from the people, and require them to supervise the opinions of those judges whom the people know whose acts they witness.

That system of our judiciary is best organized, which is best calculated to ensure public confidence, so necessary to its safe and wholesome action.

In reference to the judges themselves, it is best they should be required to perform circuit duties. It has been remarked, and it is in fact true, that "he is the best judge who decides the most causes." If you wish a man, after he has attained the age of forty, to continue to be a good judge, you must make it necessary for him to read law; he will never read it for amusement, no man does that. If, however, you bring the judge in daily contact with the bar, where he must witness the war of intellect among the profession, waged on questions which he must publicly and promptly decide, he will feel the necessity of preparing himself for such decisions. His pride of character and official responsibility, quickened by the lynx-eyed watchfulness of the lawyers, and their clients, will stimulate him to study and to read the otherwise dry and musty pages of the law. In the discharge of duties like these, he ascends the Supreme Bench with his brother judges, the better prepared to discharge the still higher duties of reviewing in bank what has been done at nisi prius. He has made him, self familiar with the local laws, and the decisions and practice of the States in which he has been called to act, and brings his due proportion of stock into the common fund.

MARCH 10, 1830.]

The Judiciary Bill.

[H. of R.]

When the whole number of judges convene upon the Supreme Bench, the local laws, the legal and judicial intelligence of every portion of the Union, are represented in that tribunal, in the judges whose business it has been to make themselves acquainted with them. And when they return to the circuits, they have a fair opportunity to witness the effects of the principles which they have settled, when carried into practical operation.

Separate a judge from this constant law school, confine him to the duty of revising some eighty or a hundred causes in the Supreme Court, and my word for it, ten years' service on that bench will unlawyerize him. He will be content to consult the advocate's brief, and cull his arguments, and decide the cause.

I have an utter abhorrence for a political judge or court, and upon that account I would not consent to relieve the judges of the Supreme Court from the performance of circuit duties.

If the judges of that court are required to perform appellate duties only, it is, in the nature of things, that they would locate themselves in and near the place where their official duties call them. In this district, under the almost certain and irresistible influence of the Executive, would the judges place themselves. The tendency of all the departments of this Government is encroachment upon the State Governments, and an enlargement of the powers of the federal head. Appointed by the President for life, fed by Congress, located within its exclusive jurisdiction, and breathing the atmosphere of federal power which infects this ten miles square, the judges would forget that there existed such political communities as State Governments, or, if they remembered them at all, it would be to allow them the poor privileges of petty corporations.

With an Executive educated in the school of consolidation, seconded by a Congress deriving powers by implications on constructions, and a court such as I have described, what would be the fate of our happy Union?

When the gentleman from New York [Mr. Strong] was laboring the other day to establish such a court, I was not surprised that the star chamber of England presented itself to his mind. It is strange, however, he did not foresee that the striking similarity between that court and his was unfriendly to his argument. Establish the system of 1801, the favorite of all who have spoken in opposition to this bill, and the Supreme Court will, in the progress of time, like its parallel, the star chamber of England, "extend its powers to the asserting of all [decrees,] or orders of State, to the vindication of illegal commissioners, and justifying the grants of monopolies, holding for [constitutional] that which pleased, and for just that which profited, enjoining to the people that which was not enjoined by the laws, and prohibiting that which was not prohibited, punishing disrespect to the State," [and offences against the powers that be.] No alien and sedition law would ever find its tomb in such a tribunal; no act of the President or Congress would ever be annulled by such a court.

It was the just and well founded apprehension, such as I have attempted to describe, of the dangerous tendency of such a judicial tribunal, which induced the republicans of 1802 to abolish the system of 1801. The numbers of the judges, and the increase of expense, were as drops in the bucket in the minds of those whose judgments declared the act of repeal. The system required no experience to test its virtues. There are some measures, so utterly at war with the republican sentiment of this nation, that need not the aid of experiment to excite public condemnation, and the midnight judiciary system of 1801 was one of them. The Presidential election, of the same year, is another. I could swell the list, if it were necessary to lead the minds of gentlemen to more recent events.

I do not, therefore, think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is obnoxious to the censure which the member from Connecticut [Mr. Huntington] bestowed upon him, for having characterized this judicial system of 1801, by the strong terms which he used, and which appropriately belong to it.

That gentleman complains of the harshness of the language employed in reference to the act of 1801, and says that, although the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Buchanan] was not of the household, he was certainly of the family to which that political offspring belonged, and that filial affection, if nothing else, should have prompted him, while opening the vault in which were entombed the measures of the administration of the elder Adams, that if he found the remains of any thing there worthy, in his opinion, of commendation, to have given it a passing notice.

I am in public as I am in private life, averse to interfering in family quarrels. Between these two members of the same political family, therefore, I will not interfere, further than accord to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the humble meed of my cordial approbation of the boldness of language and freedom of manner, in which I have, on more than this occasion, heard him denounce the system of 1801 as an illegitimate offspring of the federal household.

I have heard others, however, of the same political family, weep over its fate with all that fondness of recollection which belongs to filial affection, for with it died the last best hope of that household, who looked to the increasing energies of this offspring as the surest means to restore their lost power, and to establish a system of government for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many; a Government for the "gentlemen," at the expense of the "simple men."

Hence, the often and repeated efforts of the descendants of this political family to reanimate this fondling of their ancestors.

The present system I believe to be best adapted to our form of Government, and it ought not to be abandoned. This opinion is entertained, and has been expressed, by every one who has advocated the present bill; yet its friends are charged before the nation, in the speeches of gentlemen, with an intent to destroy the judiciary, and render it weak, inefficient, and worthless. If nothing was known of the nature and character of the measure before us, but what might be collected from the speeches of gentlemen who oppose it, in the eyes of the nation the Judiciary Committee would be justly obnoxious to the charge of proposing an innovation upon the established system of our Government; to effect which, they had invaded the sanctuary of the courts of the United States, and demolished the pillars of the judicial temple.

We propose to do no such thing; we desire to preserve the same system which the fathers of the constitution built up for their country; we desire to extend that same system of courts to the new members of the confederacy to which it has not been extended.

This ought to be done in reference to the local business in those States. It ought to be done, if we regard the political rights of these States. It must be done, if we desire to promote the sound, safe, and salutary action of the Federal Government, within its appropriate sphere, when applied to the States.

When our opponents are driven by argument from their favorite scheme of organizing a Supreme Court upon the plan of 1801, they seek refuge from the discomfiture, to a point which they imagine is impregnable, and that is, the impolicy of increasing the number of judges on the Supreme Bench.

Accustomed to look at the organization of the Supreme Court in their respective States, whose duties are confined to questions of "meum and tuum"—a court organized to settle questions for a single State, composed of from four to six judges, gentlemen conclude a greater number is not safe for the Supreme Court of twenty-four States.

They bring with them into this discussion the prejudices incident to long use and legal education, and persuade themselves that nine judges of the Supreme Court would become a mob; one gentleman compares such a court to a town meeting.

I propose to consider briefly some of the objections which have been urged on the other side, against an increase of justices on the Supreme Bench. To answer all, I would prolong a speech already exceeding the limits which I had prescribed to it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPENCER] is of opinion that an addition to the present number of the judges would tend to divide individual responsibility.

If, then, individual responsibility be a paramount consideration, the present number is already too large; and if the honorable gentleman would have individual responsibility increased to its maximum, I would advise him to reduce the court to a single judge. If that were done, he would avoid another evil which he thinks will certainly arise from an increased number of justices upon the Supreme Bench, namely, a division in opinion among the justices; for if his Supreme Court shall be composed of one judge, he will always have the advantage of a unanimous opinion upon all questions, added to individual responsibility.

Another objection against the increase of the number of justices, is, that it will diminish the force of the opinions and decisions of the Supreme Court. This implies the idea that the concurrent opinion of ten men is not entitled to as much weight does not possess so much force, as the opinion of seven.

But say the gentlemen, if you add two more judges, you will impair the public confidence in that court. Is this true? Has it been shown to be probable by any arguments or illustration? unless the gentleman means to say, that two judges who shall breathe the atmosphere of the West, will infect the present judges, and contaminate that purity which has been so highly commended on the present occasion.

Again, it is said the business of the Supreme Court cannot or will not be done if you increase the number to nine.

If seven are able to do it now, the addition of two more will not prevent them from doing it, if the two should or should not assist the present seven in the labors, or in the discharge of the duties of that court. I had inclined to the opinion that nine men, when united, could do as much labor of any kind, as seven of the same nine.

There was another reason assigned by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER] which did not strike me with the same force it seemed to have done the mind of the gentleman.

It is this, (if I comprehend the idea,) that if you put nine judges upon the bench, you will have more minds to enlighten by the arguments of counsel. There are two more judges to speak to, I grant; and if a lawyer was compelled to address himself to each judge in a separate argument, he would perhaps be required to make nine long speeches instead of seven. At present, however, he addresses the whole seven; and if there were two more placed by their side, it would neither increase or diminish his labors. I should regret exceedingly that it should add to the customary length of the arguments in that court. The mode of doing business in and by the Supreme Court, should have satisfied the honorable gentleman that his objection was not sound. The judges hear the case argued in court, they retire to their room of consultation, in that they examine the record—one reads, and the others listen; they interchange ideas, discuss in the conversational style the points in issue, form their judgment, and one of them is designated to write out the opinion of the court.

At this council board, then, I would not think the increased number of minds to be enlightened, could or would retard the business of that court. If the mere labor of that court is considered, the advantage is certainly in favor of the larger number.

The two honorable gentlemen are opposed to an increase of the number of justices upon the Supreme Bench, because, in their opinion, such a measure will tend to unsettle the decisions of that court; and the member from Connecticut, who last addressed the committee, [Mr. ELLSWORTH] told us of the deep regret which was felt and expressed by Lord Mansfield, when, after thirteen years of his service upon the bench, one of his associates assumed courage enough to dissent from his lordship. Did the honorable gentleman, in his own mind, draw the parallel between the transcendent abilities and powers of that distinguished jurist and another chief justice, or did he, by the allusion, desire those who heard him to do so?

If I thought the addition of two more justices upon the Supreme Bench would have the effect to unsettle some of the decisions of that court, I should feel much more zeal for the passage of this bill, than has been manifested by its friends. Some of the decisions of that court might be unsettled to the advantage of the country, in my humble judgment. I allude to that class of decisions which have prostrated many of the most salutary laws of the State Legislatures, passed for the protection and advancement of the rights and interests of their own citizens. I could point to some of them, if I had time, and it were proper for me to do so in this debate. This objection I lay upon the shelf.

Gentlemen, in their ardor of opposition to this bill, tell us that no tribunal exists in any civilized community, purely appellate in its character, with so great a number of judges as we propose to place on the Supreme Bench. When we refer the gentleman from Connecticut to the House of Lords of England, he tells us there is no analogy between the two, that the House of Lords in England possesses legislative as well as judicial powers. I will not agree, that, even in that respect, practically, the analogy fails.

When the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPENCER] is pointed to his own State, in which the high court of errors is composed of the Senate of the State, consisting of thirty-two members, he conducts us to the local history of New York, and informs us, that tribunal was constituted in the period of the revolution. There was one part of his historical facts new to me, and I regret they existed. In giving the reasons why that State constituted her Senate a court of errors, I understood him to say that most of the lawyers of New York of distinction and eminence in their profession, when the revolution commenced, proved to be Tories, and adhered to the enemy; consequently this court of errors was constituted for the want of legal characters out of which to form a court of errors.

This is the only instance in the United States, sir, in which the profession of the bar was found opposed to the principles of liberty and self-government; and I have a hope none of their descendants now live in that great State, to hear the tale of their ancestors' disgrace told.

As an humble member of the profession, I had contemplated with pleasure the mighty deeds of a Henry, a Hancock, and an Adams, in giving "the first impulse to the ball of the revolution." In the history of every age, we find the much abused profession of the law, in every conflict between liberty and power, contending on the side of liberty. To the intelligence and patriotic exertions of the members of the American bar in the councils of the nation, and the valor of her sons in the field, we are alike indebted for our national independence. The one directed with wisdom, and the other executed with firmness, the measures which produced that happy result.

I have heretofore considered it necessary to increase the number of judges, in order to extend the system to the new States, as an act of justice to the States and the people of those States.

I may be singular in my opinion; but if there were no circuit court business in the several States, and it were left to me, I would not constitute the Supreme Court of this nation, composed of twenty-four separate and distinct sovereign States, with less than ten judges: I would not go beyond that number.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. ELLSWORTH] told us the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States was unequalled by that of any other judicial tribunal upon earth. I agree with him, and say, that, by the express grant in the constitution, there exists no judicial tribunal of which we have any account, clothed with such transcendent powers. When I open the book of the constitution, and read that the judicial power of the United States extends to—

1st. All cases in law or equity, arising under the constitution of the United States;

2d. The laws of the United States;

3d. Treaties made or which shall be made by the United States;

4th. To cases in which ambassadors, public ministers, and consuls may be interested;

5th. To admiralty and maritime causes;

6th. To cases in which the United States shall be party;

7th. To matters of controversy between two or more States;

8th. To controversies between citizens of different States;

9th. Between citizens of the same State claiming land under different States—the question presents itself to my mind, is it safe to confide the exercise of such high powers to seven men? For one, I answer no. If you wish to preserve the peace and harmony of this Union, and save it from civil discord, beware how you confide the exercise of such high powers to so small a body of irresponsible public agents.

The Supreme Court is now claimed by some gentlemen to have been constituted for higher purposes than the trial of your cause or mine. As a court for the latter purpose, it is sufficiently large; but, as a tribunal before which, in succession, each proud member of this Union, nay, sir, the Union itself, has or may be arraigned, the functionaries who compose it on such occasions should be more numerous. If it is desirable (as I admit it to be) that respect, confidence, and obedience to the mandates of that court should be promoted in cases within its unquestioned jurisdiction, those States who have now no voice in the court should be heard.

The independence of the States, the permanency of the Union (which depend upon the existence of the States, as sovereign communities) are in no danger from the open assault of any usurper. The danger to their existence is from the regular, systematic encroachment by the Federal Government upon State authority, sanctioned by the mandates of the Supreme Court.

THURSDAY, MARCH 11, 1830.

THE TARIFF.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. ANDERSON:

“Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill allowing a drawback of nine cents per gallon on all rum distilled in this country from foreign molasses, when such rum is exported to a foreign country.”

Mr. ANDERSON addressed the House in continuation of his remarks of yesterday.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he was aware that it was the general practice of this House to instruct its committee to inquire into the expediency of adopting a measure, rather than to instruct them to bring in a bill; but as the Committee of Ways and Means had brought in a bill embracing the subject matter of this resolution, and as that bill was rejected by the House, this, or any other committee, he apprehended, would not deem it expedient to act again on this subject, unless they were under the especial direction of the House; and Mr. A. deemed it due to the House to say, that, if the subject of this resolution had been presented, unconnected with other matters, and had been acted on by the House, he should so far respect such decision, as not again to agitate the subject this session. But, as many gentlemen saw, or thought they saw, objections to some of the items of that bill, and voted to reject the whole, who, Mr. A. believed, were disposed to sustain this resolution, he submitted it in this shape, deeming it as well to take the sense of the House directly on the proposition to bring in a bill, as to take the opinion of the House after a bill is introduced.

The tariff of 1828 [said Mr. A.] proposed to encourage American manufactures, and to protect domestic industry. This resolution relates immediately to the manufacturer, and proposes to restore him in part to the situation in which that tariff found him, and, if adopted, will not only aid the manufacturer, but various other important branches of American industry. The resolution does not place this class of manufacturers in a situation as good as they were before the passage of the law, for it still leaves them oppressed with the whole of the enormous increased duty on the raw material used by them, which must still be paid if the article is consumed in this country; but as it will open the foreign market for their manufactured goods, it will be a great relief both to this class of citizens and to the commercial interest of our country. Before the passage of the tariff of 1828, the duty on molasses was five cents per gallon; then a drawback was allowed of four cents on each gallon distilled into rum, and sent out of the country. The duty is now ten cents per gallon; and this resolution proposes to allow a drawback of nine cents per gallon on all rum made from this molasses when it is exported, still having the double duty to be paid on all that shall be used in this country. I cannot conceive what rational objection can be urged to the re-establishment of this drawback. We grant a debenture equal to the duty on the same article distilled by foreigners and in a foreign land, while, by our law, as it now stands, we refuse it to our own citizens, and yet we please ourselves with the idea that we are protecting American industry. When this drawback was repealed, it was done with the expectation of helping the whiskey distiller. It was thought that it would increase the demand and price of whiskey, and thereby aid the grain grower. We have now tried the experiment nearly two years, and I believe all are convinced that its expected benefits have not been realized. Does whiskey find a more ready sale or better price than it found before the tariff of 1828? Or has the demand and price of grain improved since that period, in consequence of this restriction on the distillation of molasses? I believe, sir, if we take every price current which has been published since June, 1828, we shall find that neither whiskey nor grain has improved one cent, but, on the contrary, both have fallen greatly in price. If then, the repeal of this drawback has not answered the expectations of those who voted for it; if it has not benefited the interest it was thought it would subserve; if it does good to no one, and a positive injury to some, why should we not restore the protection, and again extend to this class of our manufacturers the encouragement we profess to extend to all others. If we wish to introduce the more general use of whiskey, and thereby aid so much of the grain market as is used in this article, it is certainly expedient to open a passage through which this rum may go out of the country, and give place to the consumption of whiskey. The effect, and only effect, this repeal of the drawback has, is to encourage and aid the foreign distiller, at the expense and to the destruction of the American distiller, to confine this rum to our own market, force it to compete with our domestic spirit made of grain, and, so far as this competition can go, to destroy the market for whiskey at home. If we honestly intend to encourage domestic industry, and enable our manufacturers to compete with foreign manufacturers, we ought to allow our citizens to obtain the raw material on as good terms as the foreigner. Let our duties on imports be what they may, it is for the interest of the manufacturer and for the country to encourage the export of all such imports as by our labor and skill shall be made of double value to the foreign purchaser; and the export will not be so well encouraged in any way, as by allowing a return of the duties paid on the raw material when it is exported in the manufactured article. While we have commerce, cargoes must, in some way or other, be made up; and as long as it is necessary for a profitable voyage to make a part or the whole of a cargo of rum, so long will rum be obtained, and continue to be an article of merchandise.

It is in vain for us to attempt to regulate the wants or tastes of foreigners. We cannot do it even with our own citizens, much less of foreigners with whom we trade, and who are independent of us. They will purchase of us, if we carry to them an article they want; and it is not the work of a moment to convince them that an article they do not want is better than one they do want. We are not alone in the foreign markets; we have the commerce of the world for competitors. If we cannot furnish them with rum, they will purchase of those who can furnish; and while foreigners prefer rum, so long will our merchants be compelled, if they trade at all, to continue to supply their customers; and if our merchants cannot obtain it of our own distillers at a rate as cheap as that distilled in the West Indies, they must take that of the foreigner, thus throwing the whole of this branch of industry into the hands of foreigners. In fact, as the law now stands, we give a bounty of ten cents per gallon on all the rum of the foreigner exported by our merchant, to break up and destroy our own manufacture, and we must continue to patronize and encourage the foreigner just as long as we deny this drawback to our own citizens.

This evil will not be remedied by a repeal of the existing debenture on foreign rum; for, as I before stated, while this article continues to be one of merchandise, it will form part of our cargoes; and if we prohibit its exportation, it will be taken in at foreign ports, or the whole trade, the carrying as well as the distilling, thrown into the hands of foreigners, so that the repeal of the existing debenture on foreign rum will only make a bad matter worse—will only strike an additional blow at our commerce. It is not merely for the distiller that we should pass this resolution, but for other extensive branches of industry that will receive great relief and support from it. Every branch of industry connected with the West India trade will be relieved, revived, and protected by it. And let me here remind the House, that we never had cause of complaint, and never, so far as my knowledge extends, have complained of this trade. It is a trade of fair, free, unrestricted exchange. It is a market for any thing we choose to send out; and many articles that now form a valuable part of the exports of our country would be nearly, if not quite, worthless without this trade. We can in this market exchange what is of little or no value to us here, for articles of great value to us—articles that not only administer to our wants and comfort, but out of which, if we do not tie up our own hands by restrictions and prohibitions, we can make an important and valuable article of export. Sir, this trade is worthy of all encouragement. It gives life and employment to a vast amount of the labor and industry of this country. On this trade the lumberman, millman, ship carpenter, fisherman, and sailor are almost entirely dependant for employment; and there is no class of men in this country more deserving of our protection than these, if severe, hardy, and unremitting labor can entitle them to our protection. Sir, the life of the northern sailor and fisherman is too well known to require any comments from me. Hardier beings never floated on the ocean. But the life and hardships of the lumberman, I believe, are known to very few on this floor. We should think an army making a winter campaign in the storms of our northern frontier entitled to our sympathy and applause for the sufferings and hardships that must unavoidably be endured through the severity of winter. Trying and severe as may be such a service, it is no harder than the lumberman endures as regularly as the winter comes. In November, or the first of December, these men go into the forest with their teams and provisions, construct a rude camp, barely sufficient to break off the wind, while they sleep on a bundle of straw, or as often on the boughs of the pine, and work from daylight until dark, in the snows of the forest, until the rivers open in the spring. When the snow melts, and the ice of the streams breaks up, they commit their lumber to the river, and close their winter's work with a labor that no men but those accustomed to repose comfortably on a snow-bank could endure for a single week. Day after day, and week after week, these men are immersed in the river, when the water is as cold as ice and snow can make it: their garments are a perfect sheet of ice, and the comfort of a dry jacket is unknown to them; and yet you find them hardy and healthy men. Hundreds may be found now engaged in the forests, with constitutions firm and unimpaired, who have, for more than forty winters in succession, been engaged in this service. I believe, too, sir, that you will not find, in any other description of mills, such constant, unceasing labor as in our lumber mills. The saw is running continually day and night—the millmen relieving each other at six in the morning and six in the evening, as regular as a watch at sea, and the labor is as uninterrupted and unceasing as is the motion of the current that turns the wheel. This, sir, is the labor and these the men that any relief given to the West India trade will aid; and I ask you if these men, who breathe the pure January north-wester, are not as valuable to you in peace or war, and as much entitled to your consideration, as those who are inhaling the confined atmosphere of a crowded manufacturing establishment?

This trade is made up of, and sustained by, industry alone. The original value of the timber in the forest is a mere mite, compared with the value this labor gives to it, after it has passed through all the operations of manufacturing, exporting, exchange, and the return of the article for which it is exchanged. It bears nearly as small a relative value to the return which labor enables it to produce, as does the spade or the hoe to the crop its diligent application eventually brings forth; and you would not more directly tax the labor of the country, where you tax an agricultural product, because a foreign spade or foreign hoe was used in raising it, than you do by taxing this trade.

No article of export employs so much tonnage in proportion to its value as a West India cargo, and the cargo obtained in exchange. A vessel that will carry out a cargo of cotton or manufactured goods, worth from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars, would be fully freighted by one-thirtieth to one-fiftieth of that sum in lumber, and so with a return cargo of molasses; and yet she will employ as many seamen, and give double the employ to landmen, who live by loading, discharging, and tending on vessels, for she will make two voyages to the other's one, and add as much to the naval strength of the country as the rich freighted ship; and all her repairs are made in this country, the West Indies being more expensive ports to repair in. Not so with the European trader; she obtains her repairs and equipment abroad: for, by reason of the enormous duties we have imposed on every article necessary to the outfit of a ship, it is for the interest of our merchant to rent and equip his ship abroad.

This material, used by the distiller, is as much the produce of our soil as the whiskey which the farmer gets in exchange for his grain, the produce of his soil. We exchange our lumber, which is the fruit of our labor, for molasses; and without this exchange the whole of our industry engaged in this branch of business must stop. In the prosecution of this trade, the grain grower is more benefited than he can be by making his grain into whiskey; for, while the lumberman and the millman are engaged in procuring and manufacturing the outward cargo, the mariner in transporting it to market, and bringing home the return cargo, the distiller in converting it into rum, and the mariner again exporting this rum abroad, they, and the ship carpenter, and their dependants, are, of necessity, consumers of the grain raised by other hands. Some of this industry has been diverted already by the operation of the tariff, and been turned to raising grain; and unless you restore this drawback, a still greater number will be forced from their accustomed employments, and, as their only alternative, must go to foreign countries, or become agriculturists: and, instead of effecting the great object for which we started, to draw off numbers from agricultural pursuits, and increase the demand for agricultural products, our legislation will have exactly the contrary effect. Such is the connexion and dependencies of commerce and agriculture on each other, that any check or embarrassment thrown upon the one, is inevitably felt by the other. Our commerce first felt the tariff of 1828: it bore hard on this important branch of our wealth, industry, and strength, from the very day of its operation; and, now when commerce is sinking under this load, agriculture begins to feel the blow. Some of the shackles on our commerce must be taken off, and this drawback, trifling as it may seem, will save to the nation thousands of tons of shipping, if not millions of capital. Freight, we all admit, is the soul and life of commerce; and it is our duty, while we regard its prosperity, to give every facility to multiply freights at home, and to obtain them abroad.

Grant this drawback, and you give to your vessels additional freights, by making a valuable article of export of your imports. And as it will enable you to increase your imports in this trade of exchange, so it will greatly increase your original export, and in all its operations infuse new life into this depressed trade.

As I before observed, while we have any commerce left, we must make up our cargoes to suit the wants of our customers. And the only question is, whether you will allow our own citizens to exchange what is of little or no value to us, for articles of foreign growth, and, after doubling the value of the foreign product by the labor of our manufacturer, allow it to be sent out of the country, or compel us to abandon this trade, and our merchants to purchase the goods of the foreign manufacturer, and pay for foreign labor.

The commerce of a country is not built up or destroyed in a day. Pass what acts you will, even lay an embargo, and your tonnage account will not show much decrease the first or second year; for where commerce can sustain itself, new tonnage is constantly building to supply the loss by decay and the loss at sea; and a restrictive act, while it will detain your tonnage in port, and thereby lessen the risk of the sea, will not prevent the increase of new tonnage, the building of which commenced before the passage of the restrictive act. The tariff of 1828 has produced but a small decrease of tonnage in the year 1829; for the contracts for vessels were made before the passage of that law, and vessels once begun were from necessity completed. If they remained in the stocks partially finished, all was lost—if completed and launched, a part was saved. But our tonnage account for the years 1830, 1831, and 1832, will, if all the present restrictions continue, show a fearful falling off in the item of national wealth and strength.

The loss of a hundred thousand tons of shipping, though it will involve many individuals in ruin, and will be felt by the whole community, is not the greatest loss. Every ton of our shipping that is withdrawn from a foreign trade, is immediately supplied by foreign tonnage. The moment we cease to supply, others take our place. The channels of trade are changed—we become less important to the comfort and prosperity of those dependant on us for supplies—new associations are formed, which will not be so easy for us to break up—and the markets that gave employ to our labor and our commerce may be gone from us forever.

It is much easier for us to retain the trade while we have it in our hands, than to regain it after we have abandoned it to our commercial competitors. Our distillers must transfer their capital and men to the West Indies. Our ship carpenters will be dispersed, many of them driven to British provinces, and the residue of them to other pursuits—they can no longer take and instruct apprentices; there will be no longer a corps of young men coming annually on the stage to fill the place of their instructors—and when we shall be convinced of our erroneous policy, and would retrace our steps, we shall find a vast amount of skill and capital forever lost to our country.

Gentlemen who were in favor of the tariff of 1828, who think every interest of the country should be subservient to a few classes of our manufacturers, if they would look to the permanent interest of those they are so zealous to protect, would be the last to oppose this, or any other measure that would relieve and aid other equally important branches of national industry. If they feel conscious that these manufacturers can, with a fair protection, sustain themselves, and wish such protection to be any thing like permanent, they ought now to come forward and advocate a revision of that tariff. I did hope and expect that the friends of that measure would come forward and propose such a revision—that they would be willing to smooth off some of its hard and sharp points, which so injuriously affect a large portion of the community without benefiting any. That, now while they have the power, they would show mercy, and not risk the whole by an unyielding defence of such of its provisions as are admitted by all candid men to be ruinous, oppressive, and absurd.

I know, when I speak of permanent protection, that we cannot, by our acts, bind those who succeed us, but I also know, that whatever is done in a spirit of fairness, mutual concession, and compromise, is much more likely to be lasting, than that which is effected by mere force of numbers.

An inquiry is now going on among the people, that will bring this country to a right result—an inquiry that cannot be stifled, stopped, or diverted. It is an inquiry each man is making of himself. What have I gained—what has my neighbor gained—what has the country gained, by these restrictions? The answer is uniform, depression, loss, embarrassment, and, in too many cases, bankruptcy and utter ruin. And the result of this inquiry will, ere long, be felt on this floor.

The very interests most clamorous for aid have sunk under the weight of the protection granted them. So peculiarly inconsistent are the provisions of the tariff of 1828 with its intention, that foreign labor and foreign manufacturers are protected and benefited by it, while our own labor and our own mechanics are taxed and oppressed, and many important branches of our own industry suspended or destroyed.

If it is expedient to oppress ourselves with these enormous taxes—if it is determined to force a surplus of millions annually into the treasury, over and above its wants, let us at least see that all bear something like an equal proportion of the burden. Above all, let us make the burden as light for our own citizens as we do for the foreigner. This is all I ask for the American distiller. I request no exclusive privilege to the injury of any of our citizens—no tax on any class of labor—I only ask that you will place our own citizens on as good a footing as you have the foreigner—that you will extend to them the same privileges you grant the foreigner—that this branch of national industry may not be absolutely destroyed.

The Tariff.

I fear, sir, that the commercial interest of this country is not a subject of even secondary consideration with this House; still I do hope that it will receive so far our consideration, that we shall not refuse to extend to it relief, when by so doing we injure no other interest of the country. And if we regard our navy, and expect it to sustain the character it has already acquired, we must turn more of our attention to the merchant service. We must aid and sustain our commerce, or our appropriations for the navy are worse than thrown away. We have yearly expended millions to repair, sustain, and increase our naval establishment; and the same Congress that appropriates millions to build additional ships of war, passes acts that must and will sweep the decks of their ships of American seamen. It is in vain to build the ship, while we are destroying the means of manning her. Shall we profit nothing from the disasters of others? Have we not in the French navy an example, showing us that ships are but built for the enemy, unless you have the sailors to line their sides? Better ships never floated than the French ships of war, and braver artillerymen could not be found than were put on board of them; but they were as sure a prize to the English sailor as he came alongside of them. Yet, sir, it is gravely proposed to man our navy with landsmen, and two years' service as a marine, it is said, will make a prime sailor. Why, sir, I do not believe that twenty years' service would make a sailor out of a marine, unless he was first a sailor. If you mean to have prime sailors, you must encourage your merchant service, and begin with the boy—ensure him to the ocean when young, and when he grows up your flag will float safely in every sea, while your ship has a crew of such seamen to man and defend her. Remove the useless and oppressive restrictions and burdens now imposed on our commerce; give to our merchants the protection enjoyed by those with whom they have to compete on the ocean, and our merchant service will raise and support in time of peace a corps of seamen, who will sustain, if they cannot increase, the reputation of our navy in time of war.

This resolution, if adopted, will be of more substantial, permanent benefit to our navy, than all the ships of war you will build these ten years. It will go to sustain that branch of our commerce, which, more than any other, causes the boy to embark on the ocean, and to these boys we must look to sustain our reputation as a naval power.

Sir, I will not longer trespass on the time of the House. The proposition is so plain a one, that I am perhaps hardly justified in consuming the time I already have taken up.

If we mean any thing by saying we are disposed to encourage domestic industry—if we are willing to place our citizens, our own manufacturers, on the same ground we have placed the foreign manufacturer, we shall not refuse to adopt this resolution.

I ask gentlemen, if they are prepared to say to our citizens, if you will renounce your allegiance to this country, take your capitol and workmen and go out to Cuba, establish yourselves there, and become subjects of the King of Spain—we will give you the protection you ask; but if you remain in this country, and continue to be a citizen, subject to our laws, we will give you no relief. And this is what, by a rejection of this resolution, you will say to every American citizen.

Mr. POLK moved to amend the resolution, by adding, "and to allow also a drawback of four and one-half cents per square yard on foreign cotton bagging, exported either in the original packages, or around the cotton bale, to any foreign country."

Mr. POLK said, in offering this amendment, he did not intend to indulge in any general discussion of the principles of the tariff. A very few remarks in explanation of the reasons which had induced him to offer it, was all that he then deemed necessary. The resolution of the gentleman from Maine proposes to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill to allow a drawback of nine cents per gallon upon the exportation of rum distilled in the United States from foreign molasses. The reason given why this would be proper, is, that the navigating interest of the East, as well as the manufacturer of spirits from this foreign material intended for exportation, were oppressively burdened by the imposition of a duty of ten cents per gallon, imposed by the tariff of 1828, on the exportation of foreign molasses. If this be a satisfactory reason why a drawback should be allowed upon this article, then he thought it could be clearly shown that, upon the same principle, a drawback should be allowed on the exportation of foreign cotton bagging wrapped around the cotton bale. The two articles stand upon the same principle, and he could see no reason for allowing drawback in one case and refusing it in the other. Foreign molasses, upon their importation into the United States, were subject to pay a duty under the present tariff of ten cents per gallon. The molasses were distilled in this country into spirits, and in that state exported to foreign countries for market. The gentleman from Maine proposed, upon the exportation of the spirits thus made from molasses, to allow a drawback of nine cents per gallon, leaving in the treasury one cent per gallon of the duty levied upon the importation of the molasses, to defray, he supposed, the incidental expenses and charges at the custom-house. Now, did not the article of cotton bagging stand precisely upon the same principle? That article, upon its importation into the United States, was charged with a duty, under the tariff of 1828, of five cents per square yard. When it was received in this country, it was used almost exclusively by the cotton planter in baling and preparing his cotton for market. It was again exported wrapped around the cotton. It was not consumed in the country any more than the molasses distilled into spirits and exported were. His proposition was to allow to the cotton planter, upon the exportation of his cotton bales, a drawback of four and a half cents per square yard on the bagging with which his cotton was wrapped for market, leaving in the treasury half a cent per square yard of the duty originally paid upon its importation. The East, or at least a portion of the East, complained that the duty on molasses was onerous, so much so, that it prevented its distillation into New England rum for exportation, and thereby affected the shipping interest; and that, therefore, a drawback of the duty should be allowed upon exportation. The South might, with equal reason, at least, complain that the duty of five cents per square yard on cotton bagging was an onerous and unnecessary tax upon the cotton planter; that, in consequence of it, he was compelled to pay five cents per square yard more for his cotton bagging, than he would have to pay if the duty was not levied; and that, therefore, upon the same principle, a drawback should be allowed to him upon the exportation of that article. If a drawback upon rum was allowed, New England would be relieved upon one item of the tariff, and could again, the gentleman from Maine has said, engage in the molasses and lumber trade. If the drawback which he proposed on cotton bagging was allowed, the effect would be, that the cotton planter could buy his cotton bagging for four and a half cents less per yard than he had now to pay for it. The only difference between the proposition contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Maine, and the amendment which he had offered, was, that the one was intended to relieve a portion of the East, and the other a portion of the South and Southwest from a very small portion of the oppressive and unequal operation of the present tariff system. He thought, therefore, that molasses and cotton bagging, however strange the association might seem to be, should not be separated so far as the proposition of drawbacks was concerned. As the object was to reduce duties on one for the benefit of one section, a correspondent reduction should be made on the other, for the benefit of another section. This was but even-handed justice, and he was willing to refer both propositions to the Committee of Ways and Means together.

A drawback upon cotton bagging exported around the cotton bale stood, too, upon the same principle precisely as the drawback now allowed by law upon pickled fish, cured with foreign salt, exported for market, stood. There was not the slightest difference. Upon the importation of foreign salt, it was subject to pay a duty of twenty cents per bushel; but if the salt was used in curing or pickling fish for market abroad, the duty paid upon the salt upon its importation was paid back to the exporter of the fish in the shape of drawback. Indeed, by the drawback allowed upon the exportation of pickled fish, the East was the only portion of the Union which did not feel the effects of the enormous duty now imposed on imported salt. An attempt had been made, at the present session, to reduce the duty on salt, but we had seen that a majority of the House would not even permit an inquiry to go to one of our standing committees of the House, but had voted the proposition down upon its first introduction. He would [he said] have preferred a direct repeal of the duty on cotton bagging, to the drawback. He had offered the amendment in the shape of a drawback, only because the original proposition was in that shape. The effect of the one or the other would be very nearly the same.

No duty was ever imposed on the importation of foreign cotton bagging until the tariff of 1824 was passed. At that time a tax of three and three-quarter cents per square yard was imposed. By the tariff of 1828, it was increased to five cents per square yard. And for whose benefit, for the advancement of what interest, or rather to whose prejudice, was this tax imposed? It was intended, it was said, to furnish a market in the Southern States for the Kentucky bagging, by excluding the importation of the foreign article. Has this been the effect? Directly the reverse. In the Southern States, the planter was still compelled to buy the foreign cotton bagging, burdened as it was with this heavy tax. The foreign article was still almost exclusively used in a great portion of the Southern States. Not a bale, he understood, of the Kentucky bagging was ever carried to some of the Southern States for market, because it would not bear the land transportation so great a distance. This duty, therefore, had not, and could not benefit the Kentucky manufacturer, in those States to which his bagging was never carried to market; and, if it did, it would be unjust. It was a useless and oppressive tax upon the Southern planter, and never ought to have been imposed. Why keep on a tax that operates thus oppressively upon the South? He knew that this was but one small item in the general system of restrictive policy, adopted by the tariff of 1828; and if this Congress were determined not to do more, he trusted they would knock off, in the language of the gentleman from Maine, some of the rough corners of this system, and at least modify some of its detail. He had hoped, at the commencement of this session, to see a disposition, on the part of the friends of this policy, to meet the oppressed and suffering South, at least, on middle ground, and modify and remove, at least, some of the burdens of which they complain.

The State, [said he] from which he came, might be said to be situated upon middle ground, between the conflicting interest of the East and of the South, growing out of this policy. In that State, the people felt the oppression and injustice of the system, but not perhaps to so great an extent as in the Southern States. They could live under any system; but they could live better without this restrictive policy, than with it. The great body of our people were planters; many of them were cotton planters—in a great part of the State, cotton was our principal staple for market. But, at the same time, we had a fresh and fertile country, abundant in all those productions necessary to sustain a dense population. This was not the case in some of the more Southern States. We [said he] can produce any article, and in as great abundance, too, that Kentucky can; and our climate enables us to produce cotton, which could not be grown in Kentucky. We could grow hemp as well as Kentucky; and if driven to it by high taxes imposed by the tariff policy, we could, and were beginning even now to make a part of the cotton bagging necessary for our own consumption. It would promote our interest if the taxes generally imposed by the tariff were reduced, and we could procure this and other articles, necessary for our consumption, at less prices. In his judgment the interest of Kentucky, too, would be promoted by a general reduction of the taxes imposed by the tariff. He had never been able to perceive what interest Kentucky could have, any more than Tennessee, in favoring the protecting policy. Her supposed interest in the article of cotton bagging was, he was persuaded, more ideal than real.

He was, [he said] upon principle, opposed to the whole system of the protecting policy called the tariff; but, as he had said in the outset of his remarks, he would not now go into the general discussion of the question. He had submitted this single proposition at this time, because it rested, as he had endeavored to show, upon the same principle with that offered by the gentleman from Maine; and because, if the friends of the system would not now modify it generally upon the principle of mutual concession and compromise, between conflicting interests of different sections, they would, he trusted, agree to alleviate the oppressive operations of some of its details. He implored the friends of this system in this Congress, to consider deliberately the present excited and agitated state of the country upon this subject; to give a listening ear to the long neglected complaints of the suffering South, and alleviate their burdens. He appealed to them to know if it was not for the permanent interest of all sections to modify the system and quiet the public mind. By adopting the single proposition he had offered, they would, he knew, go but one step towards effecting so desirable an object, but it would be some manifestation of a disposition, on the part of the majority in this Congress, to afford at least some alleviation.

Mr. MALLARY said, he was fully aware, that, whenever the tariff, in any shape, came before the House, much excitement prevailed. Whatever might be the tendency of the subject itself to produce this effect, he was determined that no excitement should be justly chargeable to any observations or remarks he might be required to make. As to the resolution introduced by the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. ANDERSON] Mr. M. said he would make a brief remark. It requires the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill to allow a drawback on spirits distilled from molasses, when exported. It is well known that this subject was discussed, considered, and decided in 1828. Congress determined that no drawback should be allowed. It is also well known that he was opposed to that decision at the time. He believed that the effects would be injurious to some interests, and beneficial to none. But the House, after the fullest consideration, in its wisdom determined otherwise. A majority decided that sound policy, the prevention of frauds on the revenue, the promotion of the agricultural interest, required the drawback should not be allowed. It was thus fixed: it was thus settled. No reason is now offered for a repeal, that was not fully urged against the passage. It was as well understood then as now. No changes have taken place which were not fully anticipated. Unless a general understanding prevailed to make the change without involving any other provision of the tariff, he was in favor of no alteration. If a general disposition did exist to make the proposed change, the proposition of the gentleman from Maine would probably have his support.

But [said Mr. M.] what is the consequence? What immediately follows? The proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK.] Mr. M. said he had been in favor of the duty on cotton bagging. He had supported that duty for the purpose of affording aid to an important domestic manufacture. The reasons for imposing that duty certainly sustain it at the present time. There is no change in the necessity or policy. In establishing a general tariff, it could not have been reasonably expected that every branch of industry would derive all the aid that was anticipated. The manufacturers of the coarsest kind of wool complain. No doubt some had been injured. He had been urged to attempt to obtain some change in the duty on that raw material. At the time of the passage of that tariff, he was opposed to that duty on such wool as was not produced in the United States. A majority of Congress considered that the duty ought to be imposed. It was done. He would let it remain. Many were opposed to the dollar minimum. The effects were pointed out. It was fully examined and adopted. He was unwilling to disturb it. Many were opposed to the additional duty on molasses. A majority decided otherwise. He was opposed to a change. The whole tariff system is, and must be, founded on a liberal compromise among the numberless interests of this extended country. In passing the tariff of 1828, they were all consulted. It was passed on that ground. Without a just and liberal compromise, no law, involving a variety of the great interests of the country, could ever be adopted. He had no doubt the tariff of 1828 had operated in general most beneficially. But its benefits will be greatly diminished, if not wholly destroyed, by perpetual agitation. Continual attempts to change its details, before its effects are fully developed, will do a thousand times more injury than all the benefits anticipated from any proposed alteration. It was due to all whose interests were dependant on the policy of their Government, to be allowed some little repose—not to be continually alarmed for their safety. He could not consent to the proposed alterations.

Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, said, this proposition to allow a drawback on cotton bagging, had come on very unexpectedly. It was one he would not have made, and he did not believe it would have been proposed by any of his colleagues. It is a small, a very small business, [said he] compared with the great drama in which they wished to take a part. But, as it had been made, he should offer no apology for intruding himself on the House. It would be expected, he presumed, that he should say something; but, independently of that expectation, he obeyed the suggestions of feelings and duty, in the course he was about to pursue. It must be admitted [he said] that the gentleman who has offered this amendment, occupies neutral ground; he stands between the manufacturers and those they would make the consumers of their bagging. He cannot be looked on in any other light than as one wholly disinterested; and so far as his object be to relieve the South of the least of its oppressions, it was, and should be, properly appreciated.

However unpleasant it was to some gentlemen who hear me, [said he] I shall feel bound to tell them some solid truths. I shall call things by their right names, even in this discussion on what all must consider as only introductory to what we will lay before the people of this nation if we may be allowed. Of all the duties imposed by your tariff, sir, [said Mr. M.] that on bagging is the most iniquitous and untenable. The facts bear me out in this assertion; they are incontrovertible. I repeat now what I said in 1828, when the tariff was under discussion. I told gentlemen they might impose the additional duty on bagging, but they could not justify it on their own principles or pretences. They did not attempt to answer the arguments urged against the increase of duty, yet they passed it, for the same reason they would have passed any other amendment, the operation of which would have been the advancement of certain portions of this Union, at the expense of other parts of it. Yes, sir, there was something due to the West for its loyalty to this idol, nicknamed the "American system;" and those who were disposed to reward idolatry, bestowed their blessing, in the form of an increased duty on bagging. Orit may be that some were disposed to punish those who consume the bagging, on account of certain very obnoxious votes given on other parts of the tariff bill. Of such, we ask nothing; and to such, we have no concessions to make. The course we pursued on that subject, has been admitted to be legitimate in legislation: I will not say since its commencement, but certainly since our acquaintance with it. How far their supposed course (he would not charge it on them, he might do them injustice) can be sustained by principle, he would not now stop to inquire.

It is charged against the South [continued Mr. M.] that we are too easily excited. Have they not sufficient cause to be excited? Do not their first and last dollar find their way to Northern pockets, without even touching at your treasury? And what produces this state of things but the great scheme of depredation, of which this subject forms but a small part? It would be out of order, sir, to go into a discussion of the whole tariff; if it were not, he could tell gentlemen why they were excited by reciting the misdeeds of this House. He hoped, however, an opportunity would occur, when he could not be restrained in the discharge of a duty he held sacred.

What claim has the manufacturer of bagging to the protection of Government? What are their numbers, the amount of capital invested, or the product of their factories, no one will pretend to assert. It is carried on to a very moderate extent in Kentucky; it is still more limited in New Jersey; he knew of no other establishments, though possibly there may be some on a small scale in Ohio or Tennessee. So little claim has the manufacture of this article on the protection of the Government, that it cannot be justified even on the doctrines of the most absurd, preposterous, and extravagant advocates of the tariff. A new scheme must be organized, and new theories must be manufactured, to give protection to this article the color or semblance of plausibility.

It is important to the interest and prosperity of the nation, say gentlemen, that her supplies should be drawn from her own resources. And pray, sir, [asked Mr. M.] what has the nation, as a nation or a Government, to do with the growth of cotton, or the manufacture of bagging? A small portion of your Southern Atlantic States only grow cotton, and no others can grow it. They have not asked your protection or your aid in any shape: they deprecate your interference with their concerns as an officious, intermeddling, and an unconstitutional exercise of authority given you for other purposes. If they are content to receive foreign bagging as they have done, and pay for it with their own money, not with funds subtracted from the Middle or Northern States, by what authority do others interpose, or for what purposes? Not for national purposes, for it is not a national affair—not for our benefit, for you do us positive injustice and injury. I was wrong, sir, when I said the cotton business was not a national affair. It has been made so of late by the pernicious legislation of this House. It is the first and greatest resource of the Government in paying its debts, and supporting its civil list, and sustaining all its institutions. Yet the great and leading object of gentlemen in this House is so to embarrass its culture, and obstruct its transportation to a foreign market, as to compel us to suffer it to be manufactured at home; and this is what they call a "home market." Yes, sir, by paralyzing the industry of the South, and obliterating its capital, the market of the United States, any part of which is glutted by a single ship's cargo, and which consumes at most not more than one hundred and fifty thousand bags per annum, is to be converted into a market for the whole product of the United States, which now averages seven hundred thousand bags! And do gentlemen really expect us to submit to such a state of things, without being "excited?" If they do, they know less of us than we had supposed.

To sustain the proposition I have just stated, as one on which the advocates of the restrictive (I might say the non-intercourse) system rely, they tell you it follows as a consequence, that the interest of a few, or of one particular section, must yield to that policy which promotes the general good. He denied the application of any such doctrine in a Government like ours, except it be on those subjects upon which the power to legislate has been conferred on Congress. But, without discussing that question now, it was easy to show the absurdity of pretending to apply such a rule to the impost laid on bagging. No, sir, it is the converse of the proposition which was enforced when this duty was laid. Kentucky alone manufactures—for the rest are not sufficiently extensive to be mentioned—while there are no less than eight States who consume, not her manufactures, but the European fabric, if they can be allowed to do so: and to four of those States, it is a fact known to all, that the article from Kentucky cannot find its way. It can neither bear transportation over the mountains, or down the Mississippi, and thence, through the Gulf of Mexico and around the coast of Florida, to the Southern Atlantic States, at a price which will enable the holder to bring it into competition with foreign bagging. No one, however extravagant in support of the tariff, or any branch of it, will deny these facts. One who has not devoted some attention to the subject, could scarcely believe that such a state of things existed in any part of this country. But the worst has not yet been told. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLARK] on whose proposition this duty was increased in 1823, was himself examined before the Committee on Manufactures; and from his evidence it will be seen that the factories in Kentucky already make better bagging than is imported, and that unless the crop of hemp be short, which compels the manufacturer to give a high price for the raw material, they can drive the foreign fabric out of the New Orleans market, or at least they can procure a better price than is paid for foreign bagging. Here, then, facts are at war with theory, and principle abandoned in practice. Who, sir, that has ever heard or read three distinct sentences, written or spoken by a manufacturer, or an advocate of the tariff, will not recollect that one of those sentences consisted of a declaration that, if you would protect their factories until they passed from infancy to maturity, and obtained possession of the market, they would ask it no longer? Then it was a millennium was to be produced in the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural world. Yet, with the capital, and all other facilities to make a better fabric, and in the possession of the market, to the exclusion of foreign bagging, the factories of Kentucky were to be protected—I will not say it was no protection, but they were to have a bounty; it is nothing less than a bounty, let others call it by what name they may. With the possession of the New Orleans market, and wholly unable to reach the Atlantic markets, who can be so rash as to attempt a justification of this duty? But the manufacturers of Kentucky are scarcely blamable. It was a day appropriated to the distribution of Southern capital and Southern labor, by a species of legislative lottery, and they had, perhaps, some claim to a share in the scheme, as an equivalent for the service they had rendered. How far the people of Kentucky have been benefited by the drawing of this lottery, is a question upon which they have not been very communicative.

Trifling, sir, as this duty may appear, it is one of the highest among your imposts. The duty is five cents on the square yard, but the width of bagging makes it about six cents the running yard. This, as an ad valorem duty, will vary from thirty to fifty per cent. The revenue collected by the Government in South Carolina on this duty alone, is more than all the taxes paid for the State Government, if you exclude that collected on a particular species of property: and it is nearly one-fourth of all collected from every source of taxation for State purposes. And for what purpose is this extortion practised? For the protection of the manufacturer of Kentucky? No, sir; I have shown he is not benefited by it. Is it to pay your public debt? No, sir; the design most prevalent is to divert the funds of the Government from that purpose. Is it levied for the support of your Government and its institutions? No one will pretend that such is the object. With what view, then, in the name of justice, was it originally imposed, or is it now continued? It was first used, sir, as a punishment for the pertinacious resistance of the South, and is now continued as a fit source from which to construct roads and canals. I have said this much in relation to the imposition of this duty and its operation. I will now speak of the amendment, proposing to allow the drawback on bagging re-exported, whether in bolts or around the cotton. What do we understand by a drawback? It is paying to the shipper, by the Government, whenever he exports a foreign article, the same or a lesser duty than that received when the article was imported into the country. It has for its justification satisfactory reasons; it is not the policy of the Government to retain the duty on an article which is neither used or consumed; and the repayment of the duty is often an inducement to reship the article, thus giving employment and activity to capital, and aiding in the navigation and commercial operations of the country. Another and important feature in this policy is, that when an article is imported, and manufactured or converted into a different fabric, and re-exported, by paying back the duty, encouragement has been afforded to the carrier, the capitalist, and the domestic industry of the country. These, I take it, are the grounds of the policy. Where the material is exported in its original state, there are few or no facilities for committing frauds: nor are these to be apprehended, with the guards adopted, even where the article has changed its character. Salt pays a duty of twenty cents on every fifty-six pounds; yet, on the exportation of fish packed in foreign salt, the duty on salt is repaid to the exporter of the fish. Bagging is imported, and pays a specific duty. It is used for packing cotton, and immediately re-exported. Is not the analogy so striking as to be irresistible? If there be any distinction, is it not in favor of allowing the drawback on bagging? Both are imported, and the duties paid. One is used in consummating the enterprise and industry of the fisherman, the other in preserving the fruits and labor of the agriculturist. Both are necessary to the objects in view, and both seek a foreign market.

Thus far the claims of the two articles to a drawback are equal, unless, indeed, the agriculturist, the husbandman, who gives life and vigor to all our pursuits, be less entitled to the favor and protection of the Government than the fisherman, whose claims, by the bye, it is not my purpose to undervalue. But here the claim to a drawback on the bagging rises superior, because, by reason of its identity, it affords fewer facilities for the commission of frauds on the revenue. It is imported in bolts, and undergoes no change, except that of being cut into pieces of four or five yards, and made into bags for the reception of the cotton. You have scarcely an appraiser in a custom-house of the Government, who could not be able, after the first comparison, to distinguish between the domestic and foreign bagging. But as to the use of foreign salt, that must depend on extrinsic evidence—on affidavits. Now, without intending the least imputation on those who receive that drawback, I cannot but say the temptation and the facilities to commit frauds on the Government are greater, and more numerous, than would exist in regard to bagging. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, [Mr. MALLARY] who has just taken his seat, to name, if he can, a single article, in the whole range of our commerce, which undergoes any change, with which it would be so difficult to practise a fraud in claiming a drawback on its exportation, as with bagging. Let him name it, if there be one in his knowledge. But, says that gentleman, the tariff was a compromise! Truly it was a compromise. But between whom was this arrangement effected? The Southern States, whose capital and labor the parties to it were dividing, and whose enterprise and industry the same parties were appropriating to their own use, had no voice in the compact. Like other parties acting in concert, but to whom it would be out of order that I should compare them, they found it difficult to divide the spoils on reciprocal terms—spoils not won by valor; not the fruits of victory achieved in honorable warfare. Compromise was necessarily resorted to: the principles of justice, equality, or reciprocity—none of them were applicable to such a state of things.

This effect of this proposition must be considered in all its bearings, we are told by the same gentleman, [Mr. MALLARY.] Why, sir, the duty on cotton bagging has no bearing, except on the Southern States, and they want no time to regulate the effects of its repeal. I hope I have shown that Kentucky did not require it. But I will not affect to misunderstand the gentleman. His allusions are to the effect which the repeal of the most trifling duty may have on the great "American system"—a system, the operation of which, it was promised, would have more beneficial effects than have ever been anticipated from the discovery of the philosopher's stone—one which was to make the poor rich by giving constant employment and high wages—the farmer was to sink under his own wealth, arising from the home market and extravagant price of grain, wool, &c.; and by an accumulation in the price of all these, constituting two-thirds of the investments in manufactories, all manufactured goods were to be rendered cheaper. Well, sir, the tariff bill passed; and how have all these anticipations been realized? The operatives, the laborers out of employment, or suffering by the low wages, and the farmer's grain rotting in his barn, or sold at a sacrifice. A portion of the goods cheaper, it is true, but of no sort of importance in estimating the benefits or injury resulting from the system. It was from the beginning a scheme of cheating; and those who innocently participated are now sensible of the delusion, but they will not acknowledge it. An abandonment of principles, when once adopted and insisted on so extravagantly, however erroneous they may be discovered to be, is a severe trial—one which few are willing to encounter. But, whenever truth, reason, and justice shall again acquire an ascendancy on this subject, (the time may be distant—I fear it is,) the fallacy of these pernicious projects will be admitted, and the extent to which they have been carried will be attributed to infatuation.

Much has been said [continued Mr. M.] as to the excitement the tariff has occasioned in South Carolina. Sir, that is not a subject for discussion here. We are not accountable to this House, on any score. If we were, I would not shrink from a contest in support of any thing and every thing the people in their collective character have said on this subject, on any occasion. There are some acts of Government, which, so far from being justifiable, are not even excusable. Of this character is your tariff: and if it does produce excitement, let those who have produced it profit by what they admit is known to them. If, instead of this, they will pursue this principle, on their heads, not ours, be the consequences.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

JUDICIARY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, on the Judiciary bill.

Mr. DANIEL, who had possession of the floor, said that, in compliance with the request of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY] who intimated a desire to bring before the House a bill of much importance to his constituents, and requiring the immediate action of the House, he [Mr. D.] would not proceed with his argument to-day, but, to give the gentleman an opportunity of taking up his bill, would move that the committee rise, and ask leave to sit again.

The committee accordingly rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the House then took up a bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of public lands," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY explained, and supported, at considerable length, the objects of the amendment to the bill.

Mr. VINTON proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "of" at the end of the seventh line, and insert the following:

"And shall be entitled to all the benefits of the act entitled 'An act for the relief of the purchasers of the public lands that have reverted for non-payment of the purchase,' approved May 23, 1828, and the said act shall be and is hereby extended to them.

"SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That every assignment of any land so reverted, or of any certificate of purchase therefor made since the same reverted to the United States, or that shall be made within six months after the passing of this act, shall be, and is hereby declared to be, null and void.

"SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That, if any person or persons shall, before or after the time of the public sale of any of the lands of the United States, bargain, contract, or agree, or shall attempt to bargain, contract, or agree, with any other person or persons, that the last named person or persons shall not bid upon nor purchase the lands so offered for sale, or any parcel thereof, or shall, by intimidation, combination, or unfair management, hinder or prevent, or attempt to hinder or prevent, any person or persons from bidding upon or purchasing any tract or tracts of land so offered for sale, every such offender, his, her, or their aiders and abettors, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offence, be fined not exceeding — dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding — years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That, if any person or persons shall, before or at the time of the public sale of any of the lands of the United States, enter into any contract, bargain, agreement, or secret understanding with any other person or persons, proposing to purchase such land, to pay or to give to such purchasers for such land a sum of money or other article of property over and above the price at which the land may or shall be bid off by such purchaser, every such contract, bargain, agreement, or secret understanding, and every bond, obligation, or writing of any kind whatsoever, founded upon a growing out of the same, shall be utterly null and void. And any person or persons, being a party to such contract, bargain, agreement, or secret understanding, who shall or may pay to such purchaser any sum of money or other article of property as aforesaid, over and above the purchase money of such land, may sue for and recover such excess from such purchaser, in any court having jurisdiction of the same. And if the party aggrieved have no legal evidence of such contract, bargain, agreement, or secret understanding, or of the payment of the excess aforesaid, he may, by bill in equity, compel such purchaser to make discovery thereof; and if in such case the complainant shall ask for relief, the court in which the bill is pending may proceed to final decree between the parties to the same: Provided, every such suit, either in law or equity, shall be commenced within six years next after the sale of said land by the United States."

Mr. LEWIS opposed the amendment. He considered it entirely nugatory, and said that every measure had been resorted to for the purpose of destroying the system of speculation which the gentleman from Ohio referred to, but without success. He supported the amendments to the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. VINTON replied.

Mr. ISACKS spoke in favor of the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. BAYLOR addressed the House briefly in support of the bill.

The question on the amendment offered by Mr. VINTON as a substitute for the amendment of the committee, being called for from different parts of the House,

Mr. MCCOY said that the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. V.] certainly deserved some consideration. He was sorry to see the impatience manifested by gentlemen to have this question put without affording a reasonable time to consider the subject. For his own part [he said] he would not vote for the bill as reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MALLARY said, the subject had been long enough before the House to give all the members time to consider it. The gentleman from Alabama had called our attention to it frequently. The debate, he thought, explained the objects of the bill sufficiently, and he hoped the question would now be taken upon it. We could not do a greater act of justice, policy, and humanity, than to pass the bill in its original shape.

Mr. BURGESS said, he must confess he did not understand the question, although he devoted as much attention to it as the gentleman from Vermont. He moved that the House adjourn; which was negatived.

The question on the proposition of Mr. VINTON being stated,

Mr. WHITTLESEY asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; but, before they were taken, the House adjourned.

PAY OF ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on Retrenchment, reported a bill to regulate the pay of the officers of the army and navy in certain cases; which, being twice read, Mr. W. moved to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHITTLESEY thought there were strong grounds to fear that the Committee on Retrenchment would interfere with the duties of other committees. He would move to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs; and if it was not properly referrible to that committee, he could not conceive what other business they had to perform. If business connected with the navy is not peculiarly the duty of the Committee on Naval Affairs, he could not say for what it was established. He thought that the business of this House ought to be conducted with more order and regularity than have the same subject before two committees at once.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that the gentleman from Ohio was not aware of the situation in which he placed the party to which he belonged. We see from correspondents at Washington, extracts from letters sometimes bearing the authority of members of Congress, which state that this Committee on Retrenchment have done nothing as yet, but to abolish the insignificant office of a poor, poor little draughtsman; but now the gentleman from Ohio states that this committee is doing too much, and is encroaching on the business of a standing committee of the House. If the gentleman will look at the rules of the House, he will find that the bill, as reported by the committee, comes within the scope of its action. If the Committee on Retrenchment has not power to act on this question, it has not power to act on any. The object of establishing this committee was, that it should look into the conduct of the Government, to ascertain what offices may be dispensed with, what expenditures may be retrenched, and what organization of the public offices may be introduced in order to produce greater efficiency and accountability. The committee, therefore, looking at the expenditures of the army and the navy, were struck with astonishment at the gradual annual increase of these expenditures. They looked to the payment of the officers of the army and navy as prescribed by the legislation of Congress; and on comparing it with the regulations adopted by the Executive Department, they found that, in some cases, the payment of a considerable portion of the officers of both departments depended on the Executive discretion, and exceeded what is allowed by Congress. This bill is intended to correct that abuse, and to bring back the mode of payment to conform to the specific legislation of Congress; and if the Committee on Military Affairs thinks that the pay of officers is not high enough, let them introduce a specific enactment to increase it. If the Committee on Naval Affairs thinks that the pay of the navy officers is not sufficient, let them also introduce a law to increase it. This bill proposes to bring back the manner of paying officers of the army and navy, to the provision of the act of 1806, passed in the time of Jefferson. That law has never been changed by Congress. By the law of 1806, officers not under actual service are only entitled to half pay, and this regulation so continued till 1819, when an order was issued by the then Secretary of the Navy "to allow all officers not on furlough their full pay and rations." We propose [said Mr. W.] to bring the law into full force, by repealing the Executive legislation which has been adopted. If this is not the appropriate business of the Committee on Retrenchment, the gentleman from Ohio ought to get up and move to rescind the order of the House establishing that committee. He rose [he said] to vindicate the committee from the charge of interfering with the duties of another committee. Their powers, he was of opinion, were concurrent. He hoped the House would consent to treat the Committee on Retrenchment with courtesy, and to permit the appropriate reference of this bill. Mr. W. again repeated the duties of the committee, and concluded his remarks.

Mr. WHITTLESEY deprecated the introduction of party allusions into the transaction of the business of the House. The gentleman from Kentucky had adverted to letter writers, and implied that the Retrenchment Committee had been chiefly urged to the performance of its duties by these letter writers. If they could only be so urged, he hoped that this correspondence would be continued, whether the authors were members of this House, or were in the gallery. Mr. W. said, he saw no letters, as the gentleman from Kentucky had done, censuring the Committee on Retrenchment. He did not know whether they said that the only result of the labors of the Retrenchment Committee was the abolition of the office of a draughtsman. Granting all this to be true, [said Mr. W.] he was informed that the Committee on Military Affairs had spent all its powers on the subject. Was it competent, then,

[he asked] for one committee to take up a subject, respecting which another committee had discharged its duty? He supposed that the rules of the House were intended to produce harmony, and that when a subject is referred to one committee, no other committee has jurisdiction over it.

Mr. WICKLIFFE made a few remarks in reply; and, on his suggestion, the bill was read.

Mr. VANCE said, there was no clause in that bill, the object of which was provided for by the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. He referred to that clause relating to officers engaged in the topographical corps.

The question, on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, was then put, and decided in the affirmative.—Yeas, 97—nays, 49.

SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1830.

THE TARIFF.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. ANDERSON, being under consideration:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill allowing a drawback of nine cents per gallon on all rum distilled in this country from foreign molasses, when such rum is exported to a foreign country."

Together with the following amendment offered by Mr. POLK:

"And to allow also a drawback of four and one-half cents per square yard on foreign cotton bagging, exported either in the original packages, or around the cotton bale, to any foreign country;"

After Mr. MARTIN had concluded his remarks,

Mr. SPEIGHT, of North Carolina, rose, and observed that the friends of equal rights and liberty should feel under great obligations to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Polk] for bringing this subject to the consideration of the House. And, I need not tell the gentleman [said Mr. S.] that I am prepared to go with him, not only in remedying the evil which he complains of, but in regenerating the whole tariff system. I view it as an imposition which is intended to be practised on the sound judgment of the people of this country, and one which, while it is intended to enslave a small portion of the Union to profit and benefit another, requires for its support a usurpation of power wholly unknown to the constitution. And I take occasion to say further, that it is a policy foreign from the true interest of this country, and one which, if persisted in, will not only end in the ruin of the Southern or agricultural States, but will sooner or later demolish this empire, and sink it into bankruptcy.

Mr. S. said, he had not risen for the purpose of attempting to discuss the general principles of the "American system;" for if his abilities were sufficient to do justice to the importance of the subject, his health would not permit it; he, therefore, asked the indulgence of the House but for a moment, whilst he, as a Southern representative, and one whose constituents felt the injurious effect, not only of the duty on cotton bagging, but of the whole system, expressed his opinion in relation to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

If, [said Mr. S.] upon an examination of the tariff of 1828, it can be shown that no article which the Southern States imported has been taxed, but such as the manufacturing States can furnish us with as cheap as we can import it, there might, at the first glance of the subject, be some justification to plead for its passage. But if it should, on examination, appear that not only those, but such as they cannot furnish us with at all, have been taxed, the inquiry will naturally result, how under heaven has it come to pass, that, under a Government which professes to secure to each portion of the country equal protection in enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, has a law been passed, which must act as an engine of oppression, and rob one portion of the Union, and take its just earnings out of their pockets and put them into others? Without intending or wishing to go into the general merits of the tariff, if I do not show, in a very few words, that the duty on cotton bagging is the effect of what I have stated, I am greatly mistaken. If the manufacturing States could furnish a supply of the article in question as cheap as the Southern States can import it, why, then, there might be some pretext for laying the duty; but it has been shown, in the course of this debate, that the very small portion of the country which manufacture hemp, can, for all the bagging they manufacture, find a market beyond the mountains; and the only effect this duty of four and a half cents per square yard has on the article at the South, is to take out of the pockets of the honest, hard working farmer nearly two hundred thousand dollars annually to squander on objects in the manufacturing States, and to support their extravagance. It has been shown by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN] in the strong view which he took of this subject, that, at the adoption of the present tariff, those who advocated the duty on cotton bagging were requested to show the advantage it could possibly be to the manufacturing States. This, sir, was not done, nor can it be now shown, only that it is necessary to make the system complete, and to effect the ruin of the South. So far as my knowledge extends, I have not, in all my life, seen one bolt of it consumed in my county; and I venture to say, if the truth could be ascertained, there has not, since the war, been one hundred bolts of it used in the whole Southern States. Sir, I undertake to say, that, notwithstanding the high duty we have to pay on the article, we can import and sell it cheaper in our market than the domestic bagging can be purchased from the manufacturers. Let any gentleman make the calculation what it will cost to bring domestic bagging over the mountains into the Southern States, or, if the gentleman please, ship it to us, and he will readily see the truth of the position which I have stated. Yet, sir, with this strong evidence before the face of the manufacturers, we are made to pay the high duty, to enable New England to buy up Kentucky, and get her to vote for the tariff. The South, then, have a right to demand a repeal of the duty. And if a majority of this House have any magnanimity or sense of justice, the appeal must be irresistible; for no gentleman, however blinded he may be by self-interest, can help seeing the injustice and iniquity of the duty.

The effect that it has on Southern States is highly injurious, and may be shown in a very few words. It amounts to this. The manufacturing States, in order to carry out the system of taxation complete, have imposed an unjust tax on a certain article of prime demand in the Southern States, and the tax is no advantage to the manufacturing States. It takes out of the pockets of the honest, hard working farmers of the South at least one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, annually, for the single article of cotton bagging. Sir, in order to prove the truth of the position I have advanced, let us suppose the Southern States to consume, annually, four millions of yards of cotton bagging, forty-three inches wide; a duty on that quantity of four cents and a half per square yard would amount to almost two hundred thousand dollars; but I have no doubt that the amount consumed exceeds that quantity. Now I ask, and I hope to be answered correctly, can any person desire more conclusive proof of the injustice and oppression of the tariff system, than is here afforded on a development of the duty on this one article? Here is a tax of near two hundred thousand dollars annually imposed on the South for the consumption of an article which they, of necessity, are compelled to have; and, not having the means to manufacture it at home, are compelled to seek it in a foreign market. And, what is most iniquitous of all, the tax does not afford a protection at all for the manufacturers of the article in the United States. I profess to be no admirer of the drawback system; I should have preferred a resolution to have abolished the duty at once. Drawbacks I conceive to be one of the many follies which we have borrowed from other countries. And, sir, my objections arise from a belief that there is concealed behind it much mischief, and often great frauds are practised on the Government. But I cannot see any good or substantial reason why the Southern States should not be allowed a drawback on cotton bagging exported from the United States, as well as the Northern States on salt used in saving fish, or, in other words, a bounty on fish exported. Now, sir, I take it, the object of drawbacks is to prevent the duty from being paid on articles which are imported, not with a view of consumption in the country, but of exporting them again; as, for instance, the people of New England urge a reason why they should have drawback on salt, that they do not consume a large quantity of it at home, but use it for the purpose of saving fish which are intended to be exported.

This, sir, was the cause of the drawback being allowed. And I have no doubt, upon the examination of the custom-house books, in New England, it would be found that scarcely any duty is paid at all on the article of alum-salt. It is quite an easy matter so to manage the business as to prevent the appearance of exporting, when in fact not half the quantity that is imported is again exported. Suppose, sir, we were to ask for an account of the quantities of fish taken by the citizens of New England. I hesitate not to say, that upon an examination it would be found that all the salt which is pretended to be exported would amount to more than two pounds to each fish.

And again, sir, there are large quantities of these fish consumed in the United States, and a large quantity of the salt which is used in saving them is again brought back. But this is not the fact as regards the cotton bagging. It is imported into the United States, and immediately exported, and never again returns; so that there is not that strong probability of fraud being practised on the Government, by allowing the drawback on that article, as on salt used in saving fish. If it were in order to go into a general discussion of the American system, it could easily be shown that it is a system of fraud and deception, and, in its effects, fatally calculated to reduce any portion of the country to utter ruin. Sir, we were promised, when this system was adopted, a home market, which would consume our products, and give us better prices than we could obtain abroad. The farmer was always to find a ready market for his produce, and money was to be put in every man's pocket. But I ask gentlemen if this has been the effect of the system? Have they found it to come up to their expectations, or has it not rather, on the contrary, produced a different result? Sir, the fact is notorious, while the manufacturing States themselves have not realized the promised benefits by one hundred per centum, the Southern States are sinking into ruin under the system. The beautiful and flourishing prospects of agriculture, which but a few years back adorned the South, are made, under the American system, to present all the appearances of havoc, destruction, and ruin.

We had entertained strong hopes that, at the present session of Congress, the tariff would have been so modified as to have united all parties. The South, sir, have never advocated a total repeal of the measure. But we had hoped, after the party contest had subsided, that a measure got up to answer party purposes, and arousing party feelings, would have been so modified as to have put the South on an equality with the manufacturing States. I do not wish to be understood as laying the passage of the tariff to the charge of the late administration. The fact is undeniable, that the measure was seized on by both sides for the purpose of answering their ends in certain portions of the Union. And it is a fact beyond contradiction, that certain individuals voted for the tariff, for the express purpose of furthering the cause of their favorite candidate for the Presidency. The South has, therefore, a right to demand of this Congress, and of this administration, a repeal of the obnoxious system, and it, in turn, is bound in good faith to give it. But, sir, if we are to judge from the former conduct of this House, what have we to hope for? A deaf ear has been turned to all our remonstrances. And whenever a measure has been brought forward, which proposed a reduction of the high duties, they have been indignantly treated. They have, in fact, been denied the usual courtesy which parliamentary usage has assigned to them. Even the State from which I come, one of the old thirteen members of the confederacy, and the first to declare themselves of right free and independent, has been refused to be heard in a remonstrance against the high and oppressive duty on salt. And to prevent a reference of her memorial to a committee who had prejudged the subject, and who had reported that it was inexpedient to make any alterations of the tariff, the memorial was laid on the table.

When the tyrannical acts of this Government become so oppressive on the citizens of any State as to move the humanity of the Legislature to interpose in their behalf, it should be a matter of serious concern to those who administer the Government. It is not an irrational inference, to suppose that the Legislatures of the States are composed of talents sufficient to judge of the powers of this Government, and we may fairly presume they will never speak but on extraordinary occasions; and when the Federal Government transcends its power, they should interpose. Sir, let me remind gentlemen to beware of the consequences that may arise from the indignity with which they seem disposed to treat the sovereign States. I ask the friends of the American system, what must be the indignation with which North Carolina will look on the proceedings of this House in relation to their remonstrance against the high and oppressive duty on salt? and what must be her feelings, when she comes to learn that, instead of its receiving a respectful reference, it has been indignantly laid on the table? I have no doubt she will view it, as I do, with contempt and indignation. Sir, in the schemes of speculation that is generally going on, North Carolina has remained a silent spectator, and has taken no part in, nor will she do it; but, however humble she may appear, I will inform the friends of the tariff, she is not entirely lost to a sense of her injured rights; and when all hope is lost, and the day of trial comes, she will not be hindmost in the ranks to resent, with just indignation, the insults which have been offered her. We are told of disunion. Sir, my State repudiates such an idea. But let me ask gentlemen what they suppose such treatment as they have received this session is calculated to lead to, when a majority of this House become so lost to every principle of justice and reason, as to refuse to hear the remonstrance of the minority? What hope have we of this republic? Can we expect a Government which is composed of delegated powers from the State sovereignties, to last, when it attempts, by almost every act of a general nature it passes, to usurp the reserved powers of its creator? Sir, I ask you if the people of North Carolina will submit to be taxed to support the manufactures of New England? This, sir, is what the Legislature of my State have remonstrated against. And, sir, I undertake to say, whatever may be the contrary opinion that a majority of this House may entertain from those expressed in the memorial, it should, coming from a respectable member of the Union, have been treated with respect. But, sir, waiving for the present reflections of this kind, let us view the proceedings in relation to the same subject, originated in this House.

H. of R.]

The Tariff.

[MARCH 13, 1830.]

What, sir, was the fate of the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, proposing a modification of the high duties on certain articles? Without even permitting it to be printed, and receive the ordinary courtesy belonging to subjects of importance, it was on the first reading indignantly laid on the table. From such a course of legislation as this, what has the South to expect, when one portion of the Union becomes so powerful in legislation as to oppress the other, and so insensible to justice as to refuse to hear their remonstrances? There is but one alternative left, that alternative I need not mention; "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." Sir, what are we to say to our constituents, when we return to our homes, groaning, as they are, under the most excessive and unjust system of taxation to be found on the records of any nation? They will approach us to know if we have redressed their grievances! What must be their feelings when we unfold to them the history of our legislation? What must be their feelings when we tell them that nothing has been done? Disappointed in their expectations, they will depart; and driven to desperation by the unfeeling acts of an unrelenting and overbearing majority opposed to their welfare and happiness, from the most unworthy motives, the worst of consequences may be dreaded. Sir, there is a state of feeling to which human nature can be driven, to which insulted feelings and wounded pride may be driven, that death is preferable to life. Such, in my opinion, is the effect this tariff will have on the South, if not speedily repealed. The history of this country affords a striking proof of the height of desperation to which an oppressed people may be driven. When, sir, the tyrants of Great Britain were planning the destruction and ruin of these colonies, a system of taxation, fraught with such principles of injustice and inequality, never entered their minds.

The famous stamp act and tea tax sinks into insignificance when compared with the American system. The contrast is this—the former was a tax imposed by tyrants, in which we were required to pay pence; the latter is one imposed by our brethren, our neighbors, and professedly republicans, in which, for every one hundred dollars worth of cotton, rice, or tobacco, we export, we are made to pay forty-five dollars. It matters not whether the tax be laid on imports or exports, it is all the same if the doctrine be true that exports and imports in a series of years are equal. We export to import; and any duty which Government may lay, is a tax on this exchange, and, if laid in this country, must, in the end, come out of the producer of the article exported. If the friends of the tariff are allowed to collect out of us a tax of forty-five per cent., they might as well take one-half of our cotton, rice, or tobacco, before we export it, as half the articles we import in exchange for it; for my own part, I can see no difference: and if the system of robbery and plunder is to be riveted on us and our posterity, I, for one, would much rather they would take the raw material at once. If, sir, it is to be the law of this land that for every dollar which the honest, hard working farmers I represent, spend for the necessities of life, they are to pay this Government forty-five cents, I hope in God the system will be so modified as to authorize them to take half of our cotton, &c. &c. at once. I would much prefer it to the present tariff. Every person who is desirous of knowing how he is affected by the tariff, may tell by setting down at the end of the year, and simply calculating how much he has expended during the past, for coffee, sugar, salt, iron, &c. &c. If he has expended ten dollars, he has paid four dollars and fifty cents. If he has expended twenty dollars, he has paid nine dollars. If he has expended thirty dollars, he has paid thirteen dollars and fifty cents. If he has expended forty dollars, he has paid eighteen dollars. If he has expended fifty dollars, he has paid twenty-two dollars and fifty cents. If he has expended one hundred dollars, he has paid forty-five dollars. If he has expended two hundred dollars, he has paid ninety dollars. The duties on imports amount to forty-five per cent. ad valorem. When the importing merchant lands his goods, he pays under the tariff that amount on his goods. In the per cent. he lays, he of course includes it, and therefore the consumer has it to pay. And, after all, it may be safely said it is a duty on exports, because we pay for these articles with our produce, and in the end the farmer loses out of the price of his produce. Sir, it is not my object, nor wish, to go any further into the general merits of the subject; I know it is not strictly in order, and there are many considerations which at present forbid it. But, sir, I think it is not a difficult task to show the analogy existing between the conduct of old England towards the colonies previous to the war of the revolution, and that of New England towards the South in relation to the tariff. When the mother country engaged in the French war which preceded the revolution, the colonies, to a man, came forward in support of British rights; they sacrificed their lives and treasures in support of the cause of the mother country. After the war had terminated, some of the nobility visited this country, and saw the flourishing condition in which we were; they saw that, in point of wealth, and in a very few years, we should outstrip the mother country. When they returned home, and related these things to the ministry, it became a matter of serious concern; and it was soon resolved, that, in order to prevent the growth and population of the colonies, a system of taxation should be devised, which would enable the mother country to reimburse herself for losses sustained during the war.

Sir, let us now turn our attention to transactions of a more recent date, and come a little nearer home. After the late war with England, in which the South bore a conspicuous part, and which was a war more to protect New England seamen and commerce than our own, the South planted the standard of liberty, and rallied around it; the sacrifice which she made was more than double the gain she derived from the issue of it. After the war was ended, what was the first step taken? The New England manufacturers came forward, and insisted that by the war they had been driven to adopt the manufacturing system, and unless we gave some protection they were ruined. The liberality of the South was appealed to, and on this, as on all others, it was extended. We lent our aid, and gave them the protection they demanded. The South felt no hesitation in sacrificing a reasonable portion of their interest to accommodate the North. But, sir, this was not deemed sufficient; it was evident that the tariff of 1816 was not sufficient to tax the South to that degree which would enable the manufacturing States to compete with them; they saw that in a very few years the rising wealth of the South would so far outstrip them, as to sink them into insignificance and contempt; and hence the famous American system was devised, which was not only intended to raise the manufacturers in point of wealth, but sink the South into ruin and poverty. What, in 1816, was asked as a matter of favor, was in 1824 demanded as a matter of right. Then, and not until then, was it asserted that a system of taxation was morally and constitutionally right, which seized on the wealth of one portion of the Union, and took money out of their pockets and gave to another. Not until then was the doctrine urged, that, because Providence, in the impartial distribution of its favors, had cast the lot of some in a rich, fertile country, warmed by the genial rays of the sun, and others in a more barren and cold climate, the former had to be taxed to make up, in point of wealth, the deficiency of the latter. This, sir, I repeat, is the effect of the tariff; and if the principle holds good in one point, it will in all. And, upon the same principle of reasoning, you have the moral and constitutional right to tax the wealthy part of our community, to an extent that will bring the poor class on an equality with them. I shall not, on the present occasion, go into arguments to prove the unconstitutionality of taxing one portion of the Union for the support and advantage of the other, but I must ask the indulgence of the House a few moments, while I notice some of the reasons which are urged in support of it. We are told that this country is able to live on its own resources, independent of foreign markets, and that, by adopting the American system, a home market can be found for our own produce. Sir, to my mind, there is not to be found in support of any doctrine ever advanced on earth, an argument more destitute of truth and reason than this. In the first place, it is a gross absurdity to say that the American system affords a home market; if it does, and the manufacturers can furnish us articles as cheap as we can purchase them abroad, why are these high protecting duties demanded? and why is it that the manufacturers consider any reduction of duties rather a curse than a blessing? To come to the point, if they can furnish us cotton bagging as cheap as we can import it, why is the duty of four and a half cents per square yard laid on the article? Why not pass the resolution on the table, allow the drawback, and I will venture to say the South will purchase the article where it can be had on the best terms. Sir, it is equally absurd to say that this country can live on its own resources, as well as to exchange with foreign nations; and the doctrine proceeds from the same selfish disposition which unhappily actuates some individuals in our country. Because God has blessed them with opulence and wealth, they are disposed to live on their own means, and even without exchanging the ordinary civilities incident to civil life. In those States which have a dense population, I pretend not to say but that it may be to their interest to carry on manufacturing; but to every person acquainted with the Southern States, it is apparent that the system cannot be adopted without incalculable sacrifice. Unacquainted with the arts of manufacturing, owning a rich and fertile soil, and being under a climate admirably adapted to the culture of cotton, tobacco, rice, and other great staples, it is to our interest to cultivate them, and exchange with other nations for the necessaries of life; and I should like to be informed, upon what principles of moral reason it is, we are bound to abandon our native pursuits, to accommodate the manufacturing States. Though we ask them not, sir, for a total repeal of the tariff, we are willing to extend them protection, so far as to place them on an equality with us. I, for one, am willing to extend protection, so as to enable our country in war to defend herself—further I am not willing to go, and further the South will not go. That the present tariff is the reverse of this, needs no argument to prove. As members of the same great family, we have made appeals to the magnanimity of Congress; but our remonstrances are turned a deaf ear to. We are told that a majority must and ought to rule; and that, if we are dissatisfied, we must appeal to the judiciary, which is the tribunal to settle disputes between the General Government and the States. Sir, I confess, in ordinary matters between the States and individuals, the doctrine is tenable. But I deny, that, in those questions which affect the sovereignty and independence of the States, the majority are to rule, or the judiciary is to be the umpire to decide. No person on earth is more disposed to yield to the judicial decisions of the country than I am, in matters cognizable before them. But when questions of conflicting interest exist between the Federal Government and the States, I deny that the judiciary is the tribunal to decide. The people themselves are to decide this matter. And I undertake to say, if the grievances under which they labor are not speedily redressed, they will decide it. But, sir, one word more in relation to the judiciary. Suppose the Chief Magistrate of this country, and a majority of the Senate, to be in favor of the unlimited powers which some attempt to give this Government, and vacancies should occur in the judicial department thereof, it is not irrational to suppose (if the powers be considered, that the judiciary are to decide all questions of sovereignty between the General Government and the States) that men, whose opinions lean to the ministerial side, would be selected, and placed in power. And, sir, with a President and both branches of the Government in favor of giving to it unlimited powers, what prospect have an injured minority of justice, when they appeal to the judiciary? This doctrine of the minority submitting to judicial decisions, is the doctrine of despotic Governments, who never fail to manage the matter so as to make that branch of the Government subservient to their will; and once let the States concede this power to be in the judiciary, and let the people calmly submit to it, (which God forbid!) and your Government, sir, which is called republican, and said to be limited in its powers, will usurp the powers of the State Governments, because it is unlimited in its control, and the liberty of this country finally destroyed by an undue exercise of its powers. It is not difficult to see the rapid strides which this Government is making after power; and the only way to check the evil, is to cut off the source from whence it derives this enormous quantity of money. The amount collected from imports is annually about twenty-three millions of dollars, of which the Southern States pay about sixteen millions. And, sir, from this unequal and unconstitutional system of taxation, we have prayed to be relieved, and from time to time have remonstrated. Our State Legislature has protested against this system. Meetings have been held, in which the unjustness of the tariff policy has been set forth, for which we have been branded with the epithet of disunionists. The South cherish no such feelings; they are as firmly attached to the Union as any portion of the United States.

But, sir, let me ask gentlemen to pause, and solemnly pause, and reflect on the course they are pursuing. A respectable portion of the Union have remonstrated against the unjust system of taxation under which they are made to labor, and this House has, on all occasions, set at naught the petitions. Their remonstrances against an unconstitutional exercise of power towards them have been indignantly kicked out of doors. I ask gentlemen if they suppose the wounded pride and patriotism of the South will tamely submit to such treatment? Sir, we want no disunion, and the charge is a foul aspersion, and I indignantly throw it back. The wish of the South is to cherish unimpaired the principles of the constitution, venerate its sanctity, and hand it down to posterity unimpaired. But, sir, when we see that hallowed instrument made to subserve the most unworthy motives; when we see that instrument which was made to protect us, and secure to us our liberty, used as an engine to oppress, we have but little to hope for. For my own part, I have no hope that the present Congress will do any thing to relieve the grievances of the South; nor do I believe any thing will ever be done, until we take a bold and independent stand. Sir, I shall advise no harsh measures, but my own opinion is, from the cruel and unprecedented treatment the South has received, she would be justifiable in throwing her ports open, and declaring the tariff unconstitutional. And until some such measure as this is adopted, we are doomed to a state of vassalage. When the South act as one man, and assert their injured rights, they will be speedily redressed, and not until then.

Sir, gentlemen may say this amounts to treason or disunion. But I think not. It would be the exercise of a power reserved to the State sovereignties, and the only alternative which is left an oppressed people, driven to desperation by the usurped powers of the General Government. It would in my opinion be that step, which, if taken by any one of the States, would lead to a speedy repeal of the tariff. And I have no doubt, if this House should persist in the high-toned career which has characterized their proceedings this session, in relation to this subject, it will sooner or later inevitably lead to it. And I hope, when this is the only alternative left us, there will not be found in the whole South a man to collect the duties for the General Government. Sir, I have devoutly prayed that this "cup might pass us." Should it not, and we are forced to drink it, the consequences be upon them, and not upon us.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, said, although I am convinced that the resolution on your table would, by its adoption, relieve an important branch of industry in New England from an unjust oppression, and thus tend to extend her commerce and increase her resources, yet, disconnected with the amendment, I could not hesitate to vote against it. By the adoption of that resolution, we would remove one of the greatest evils which the people of New England experience from the present system of commercial restrictions, and thus unite her politicians still more firmly in that unholy war, which is so relentlessly waged against the great and legitimate interests of this country. Take the resolution in connexion with the amendment, and my present impression is favorable to its adoption: for, although convinced that nothing short of a thorough revision of the revenue laws can either heal the wounds, or soothe the irritated feelings of the South, yet a drawback of four and a half cents per square yard on foreign cotton bagging must be severely felt by the manufacturers of the domestic article; and, by at once destroying the fallacious and extravagant expectations in which the people of the West have indulged, may produce a rational mode of thinking, and ultimately relieve our commerce from the shackles of the "American system."

As the operation of the proposed allowance of drawbacks is in direct opposition to a system of policy which has been loudly condemned by those whom I have the honor to represent, and will effect, indirectly, the same objects which would be directly produced by a reduction of duties, I trust that I will be indulged in a few brief remarks upon the subject of protecting duties.

It is not, sir, as the representative of a section of this country only, but as an American citizen—it is with the feelings of one who loves his country, and desires her institutions to flourish, that I address you. It is with the sincere belief that the laws passed by Congress for the protection of domestic manufactures, are not only unjust in their operations, but that they are in violation of the spirit of the constitution, and utterly destructive of the principles of equality upon which this Government is founded.

In what article, section, or amendment to the constitution, do gentlemen find a power given to impose duties, amounting almost to a prohibition of foreign importations, for the encouragement of domestic manufactures? If there is such a grant of power, it has escaped my observation; if there is no such power delegated, its exercise must be founded in usurpation; and we are bound by every consideration of honor, religion, and patriotism, to retrace our steps.

I know that there has been a mode of construction adopted on this floor, which, under the power "to regulate commerce," conveys to Congress the power to destroy commerce; I know that there has been a mode of construction adopted on this floor, which, under the expression in the constitution, "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," conveys to Congress power to pass whatever laws may, in the opinion of its members, be thought necessary. Gentlemen who thus construe the charter of our liberties, may act conscientiously in the support of the "American system." The mode of construction which they have adopted, has broken down every barrier opposed by the constitution to the exercise of unlimited power; and there is left no control over their votes, but their ideas of expediency. Under the pretext of the general good, they may trample upon the rights and liberties of their fellow-citizens; the oaths which they have taken to "protect the constitution of the United States," is a nullity; for to them there is no constitution to protect. To them the theory and principles of this Government do not exist: they have overleaped the last barrier opposed to the encroachments of the majority upon the rights of the minority; and to them this floor has already become an arena for the struggle of interest. I know that constitutional objections had as well be urged to the marble pillars which support this dome, as to them; for they would be convinced as soon.

To those gentlemen who believe that the powers of this Government have some limit, but who think that Congress has exercised a constitutional power in imposing on the commerce of the country the fetters of the "American system," I would address myself. I conjure them by every tie of patriotism, by every recollection of the past glory and happiness of this country, and by every hope for the permanency and continuance of this Union, calmly and dispassionately to review their opinions. I ask them to inquire if, in the pursuit of partial objects, they have not allowed themselves to be misled to the enactment of laws, which, in their operations, must bring ruin and desolation upon a portion of this country. I ask them to inquire whether, in exercising the power to levy duties on foreign importation, they have preserved the letter of the constitution, if they have not violated its spirit.

Sir, I appeal to the friends of the American system; as patriots I appeal to them! Do they believe the tendency of the existing tariff is to diffuse health and prosperity through every section of the Union? Are they not convinced that such is not its tendency? Are they not, on the contrary, convinced that its evils are general, its benefits partial; that, if it has opened new sources of industry in one portion of the United States, it has produced depression in another? If so, as patriots looking not to the advancement of particular interests only, but to the good of all, they are bound to alter it. I call upon them as republicans. I ask them if the tariff of 1828 is not anti-republican and aristocratic in its operation; if its tendency is not to enrich the wealthy, and impoverish the poor, to make many dependant on a few, even for that occupation which is necessary to their existence, and thus to destroy the purity and corrupt the sources of elections. If so, as republicans who believe that purity in our elections is essential to the preservation of that virtue in the Government upon which our institutions must mainly rest for support, they are bound to modify it.

That a single interest, and that, too, an inconsiderable one, should have engrossed the entire protection of this Government at the expense of all others—that a few monopolists, who neither from numbers, or any other consideration, are entitled to direct our councils, should rule the destinies of this nation, exhibits the most singular instance to be met with in the annals of human history, of an intelligent people allowing themselves to be unresistingly led to the sacrifice.

How is it, sir, that in a country where error and prejudice should flee before the illumination of unrestricted inquiry, a system so unequal in its operation, and so incongruous with our republican institutions, should have found a home? To me it is an enigma: I know of nothing connected with our history to which it can be attributed, unless it be to the exaggerated terrors inspired by the last war, that we might again be found without the means of defence. At the conclusion of that war, every circumstance, both internal and external, opened a boundless field to American enterprise: the planter of the South gathered a golden harvest as the reward of his industry; the farmer of the Middle and Eastern States received a liberal price in exchange for his wheat and other productions. In the East, the West, and South, the rich and varied productions of our inexhausted soil fed and clothed the population of a world. In short, our commerce and agriculture enjoyed an unexampled and unequalled prosperity, our manufactures alone were depressed; those who had supplied our soldiers with blankets and clothing, to protect them against the rigors of a Canadian climate, were alone unable to join in the song of grateful joy, which sounded from one extremity of this Union to the other. A sympathy, founded in the noblest feelings of the human heart, was excited in their favor; the generous South itself extended the fostering hand of protection; it was no time for the discussion of constitutional questions, and, in 1816, the wedge, the fatal wedge, was entered, and it has been driven, and driven, until it has produced a schism between the different sections of this country, which God grant may not prove incurable. Even then some of our statesmen (whose names will ever shine conspicuous on the pages of American history) saw, through the mists of general delusion, the outlines of that mountain, which now threatens to burst upon us with all the force of a volcano. In vain did those faithful sentinels warn their countrymen of the danger which was approaching; the current of sympathy was too strong to be resisted, and the door was widely opened, through which the constitution has been assailed, and the inhabitants of one portion of this Union been made to pay an enormous tribute to those of another.

The Government of the United States being formed for the common benefit, and resting upon the broad basis of equal rights, it follows that any law which operates unequally is a violation of its principles. That the tariff of 1828 operates with great inequality, there is no doubt; if it does not, why do some regard it as a blessing, while others denounce it as the worst of evils? From whence arises the discontent of the people of the Southern States? Do not add insult to injury, by telling them that the evils of which they complain are imaginary; they will not believe you. Gentlemen may say that a tax upon imports is a tax exclusively upon the consumer; that consumption for the most part is proportioned to population, and therefore the burdens of the tariff are equalized. Sir, I admit that the burdens of the system are felt by all, but I deny that they are in an equal degree. There is not, in the science of political economy, a proposition more susceptible of demonstration, than that a tax upon importation operates indirectly as a tax upon exportations. Some of the States export to a much greater extent than others; and thus it is that the tariff operates unequally. A single example will illustrate the proposition. We will suppose that ten pounds of cotton would purchase one yard of woollen cloth, free from duty; add fifty per cent. on the value to the yard of cloth for duty, and it will require fifteen pounds of cotton to pay for it. I will submit it to the impartial consideration of gentlemen, whether that provision in the constitution, which directs that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State," is not violated by a duty which indirectly operates as a tax upon exportation. This objection, if it exists, is more particularly applicable to a duty on cotton bagging, than on any other article, for it is used for no other purpose than to confine cotton, in order that it may be exported. Under the tariff of 1828, the average duties amount to much more than fifty per cent.

Is it not monstrous, sir, that the people of any portion of this country should be compelled to pay more than one-half of their income for the support of Government—for the support of Government, did I say? Not so—but to build up, in this republican country, the worst of all aristocracies, an aristocracy of wealth.

This is surely enough, but it is not the worst evil we have to apprehend from that system which has been forced upon us by the clamorous importunities of interested monopolists. You must unchain our commerce; you must reduce duties which amount almost to prohibition on foreign importations, or drive us from foreign markets, and utterly destroy the value of those productions, embracing the great staples of the South, which depend principally on foreign demand for a market. This objection I have frequently heard replied to, by the observation, that European manufacturers cannot do without our principal staple of export. If this remark is true in relation to cotton, it is false in relation to rice, flour, and other productions: but it is not true even of cotton. Where are the fertile plains of South America? The cotton of Egypt, even under the arbitrary government of a Turkish Pacha, (which must, in some measure, paralyse the industry of his subjects,) competes with ours in European markets. In the East Indies, where the cotton is indigenous, it requires nothing but the substitution of European skill and industry to drive our cotton, as it has our indigo, (with the slightest disadvantage against us,) from every foreign market. To effect this, it does not require the adoption of retaliatory measures on the part of other Governments. Commerce is an exchange of equivalents, and there is nothing which makes it the interest of nations, whose productions are excluded, to continue with us a losing trade; their merchants and manufacturers, not from hostility to us, but from a regard to their own preservation, must look for some market to purchase, where they can also sell. By refusing their productions, we destroy their ability to purchase from us, and we must reap the fruits of such a policy, in being excluded from all but our domestic market; a market which cannot, under any circumstances, consume one-half the cotton now produced in the Southern States.

Some contend, that if our tariff was originally impolitic, its passage has induced many to embark their fortunes in manufactures, and that we are bound, from considerations of good faith, to continue it in existence.

Sir, we do not live under a government of precedents, but under a written constitution, which was intended to limit our power; and if we discover that we have overleaped the bounds of that constitution, yea, more, if we discover that we have legislated for partial objects, or passed laws which drain the resources of the merchant and planter to the coffers of the manufacturer, we should repeal them, even if the certain consequence was the ruin of every manufacturer in the nation.

Other Governments are formed, for the most part, from history and experience; under them the only obstacles opposed to the encroachments of power and prerogative, on the liberties of the people, originate from immemorial usages, or such expressions of popular rights as have been at different times extorted from the unwilling hands of power. In Governments having no other checks, it is essential to the appearance of national liberty, that precedents should have the force of constitutions. Not so with ours; all the power which we can legitimately exercise, we derive from a written constitution; and the powers not given by it are expressly reserved to the "States or to the people." Here a doubtful power cannot be sanctioned by use, nor become, by precedent, a matter of right.

There is no subject in the range of national legislation, upon which my constituents feel so much alarm, or which they have so unanimously deprecated, as the power assumed by Congress to regulate individual industry. They not only regard it as the offspring of unauthorized construction, and an exercise of power not intended to be given by those who framed or by those who adopted the constitution, but they fear its exercise must lead to the greatest abuse. Fear, did I say? They know its direct tendency is to engender those local feelings, and sectional animosities, which every man who desires the Union to continue, must regard as the worst of evils. Why do the inhabitants of this country regard each other with prejudice, distrust, and suspicion? The answer is obvious. Congress has assumed the exercise of powers which has awakened individual cupidity, and local interests have contended for ascendancy, and usurped in the halls of legislation that place which should be consecrated to patriotism and virtue. I know there is not a gentleman on this floor who would not repel the influence of sectional feeling, in legislating for the American people; but such are the deceptions of the human heart, that such feelings may exercise an influence on our opinions, of which we are not aware. Let us endeavor to resist their influence. Let our motto be, "our country!" With this motto, we will march under the banner of the constitution and of equal rights, to great and enduring national prosperity; sectional feelings and animosities will be forgotten, and the inhabitants of the East, West, and South will again hail each other as brothers and friends, under the common title of American citizens.

Sir, I cannot contemplate without horror the consequences of a different course. Discontent to the existing duties is universal at the South. The people believe that they are burdened by an almost insupportable taxation; but even of this they would not complain, if the object was national. In every trial you have found them ready; they ever have been ready, at their country's call, to meet her invaders; therefore, accuse them not of a want of patriotism. But I tell you that discontent, I had almost said despair, is general at the South. A cloud has lowered on the prospects of the patriot and philanthropist, and many think, without a change of measures, the day is not distant when a regard to their own preservation will compel them to seek, under the protection of the State Governments, a refuge from the usurpations of the National Legislature. They have endured much—they will still bear much; but rely upon it, there is a spirit at the South, which will not wait until her cities are deserted, and her country made desolate. Neither will her sons turn their backs upon the homes of their ancestors, to seek in some more favored land a refuge from your exactions; they will defend their homes—they will resist your tyranny, "peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must."

I appeal to the gentlemen from the South, the newspapers of the day, and, lastly, to my noble but oppressed constituents, and ask if this description is exaggerated. If gentlemen wish this Union to continue, let them adopt the means of preserving it; if they are not prepared to surrender the last home of freedom upon earth, I beg them to consider upon what may be the consequences of their measures. Let avarice usurp in this hall the place of patriotism and virtue; let the majority acknowledge no rule of conduct but sectional interest, and the days of this Union are numbered! Will gentlemen wait until resistance to the laws of this Government commences, before they extend relief? It may prove a fatal delay! Let the States be once arrayed against each other; let the sword of civil war once be drawn, and where, where, sir, will the conflict end? It will be no transient cloud, passing over our political horizon, soon to leave our prospects bright as ever; it will be no petty insurrection; but the people of a large portion of this country believe that their rights as citizens have been outraged; and, should the crisis arise, (which God forbid,) when it may be necessary to defend those rights by force, the spirit of the South will have departed, her sons will have forgotten that when a people have not the courage to defend their rights they are no longer worthy to be free, if they do not, with one accord, rise in their defence, and protect, with their dearest blood, the glorious inheritance of their fathers.

In the struggle which resulted in the independence of this country, the soldiers of the revolution did not endure the hardships of a desolating war, to enable a portion of their descendants to oppress the rest. The sufferings which they then endured were intended to benefit their whole posterity, and to establish a Government, extending its benefits equally to all. When the soldier of New England laid down his life on the field of Bunker's hill, his last moments would have been embittered by the reflection that his descendants were to become the oppressors of their fellow-citizens. When the soldier of the South died on the plains of Camden, little did he think that his sons were destined to pay a tribute to the descendants of those who by his side had breasted the storm of battle.

After that war was terminated, each State constituted within itself a separate and independent sovereignty, and each was perfectly competent to continue so. Common interest, however, soon united them in a league, which experience soon proved to be inadequate to the great purposes of Government. Afterwards, the constitution of the United States, enlarging and more clearly defining the powers of the General Government, was formed and adopted.

Never, to all appearances, was there a Government formed under such auspicious circumstances. The history of all ages and all nations was open before its framers; they saw that ambition, avarice, and oppression had defaced almost every page of that history; that Governments the best founded had not been able to withstand the desolating influence of human passion; and that Time, in his resistless course, had swept away the proudest monuments of political wisdom. Its framers were composed of heroes, statesmen, and sages, who had devoted their lives to the service of their country; and fondly did they hope that the Government they had formed was so carefully guarded against abuse, that, when centuries should have rolled their courses in the tide of time, it would still remain a blessing to their posterity. Can it be possible, sir, that this glorious Government is destined to fall a sacrifice to the monopolizing spirit of a few visionary manufacturers? If I were a manufacturer myself, I would not hesitate to see every manufactory in this nation sunk into the depths of the ocean before I would endanger the existence of the Union. If there is a gentleman on this floor who would hesitate between these alternatives, let him announce it! I know there cannot be one. But such is the fact! Let those who doubt, go to the South, and judge for themselves. They will there see a people almost in the agonies of despair, who would willingly die in defence of the Union, but who are determined not to submit to laws which they think are in violation of the constitution; and which, if continued, they believe must convert a prosperous country into a waste and desert.

It is immaterial, sir, whether this opinion is founded in reality or in misconception; the effect is the same. Opinion is the only tribunal to which they have, or to which they can appeal; and opinion has pronounced the tariff unconstitutional. Admit the federal court to be the tribunal appointed by the constitution, and what redress can it afford? That law is upon its face constitutional; and no court can pronounce it to be otherwise, even if, in the opinion of its judges, it violated every principle of the constitution. Congress has the right to lay duties for revenue; and no judicial tribunal can assume the legislative power of determining what amount of duty is for revenue, and what for protection. Change the title of your law; let it profess to be what it is; call it "an act for the protection of domestic manufactures and the destruction of foreign commerce;" and then, if an individual complains that he is oppressed by its operation, the federal court may afford him relief; but, until this is done, it is derision to direct the sufferer to that court.

Having made these few remarks upon the principles of the existing revenue laws, and to show their unequal bearings, I will proceed to make a few observations upon their general expediency.

This country, sir, certainly possesses every advantage for the raising of raw produce. The nations of Europe, on the contrary, with a population that cannot find employment in agriculture and commerce, possess every advantage to manufacture cheaply. If we can exchange our produce for double the amount of European manufactures that we can for American, is it not obviously our advantage to exchange with the European manufacturer?

The Tariff.

To an unsophisticated mind, this question conveys with it an evident proposition. But the rulers of this nation have thought differently. In imitation of a system of monopoly, which originated in an age of comparative barbarism, (and which is now discarded by every liberal politician of that nation which has carried it to the greatest extent,) we have fettered the industry of our constituents, and closed against them the sources of that prosperity which has made them great and powerful. By limiting the field of enterprise, we have caused a reduction in the price of every production which depends on foreign demand for a market, and brought to the verge of a premature decline the commercial and agricultural interests of the country.

Nature has legislated for the people of this country; her laws are inscribed on your fertile valleys; she has declared, that, to be prosperous, they must be agricultural and commercial. We have endeavored to resist her mandates; we have attempted to transplant into this country a species of industry, which requires a starving population for its support; we have attempted, by legislative enactments, to convert the freemen of America into spinners and weavers. What, sir, has been the consequence? Let those who represent manufacturers answer, if they have not experienced the most disastrous consequences from the tariff of 1828. I am informed that almost every branch of industry, which was intended to be protected by that iniquitous law, has experienced a calamitous reaction. If this is true, and I have not heard it contradicted, does it not afford a sufficient commentary upon the policy of the protecting system?

I would inquire, what interest has the West in the tariff, which can compensate to her the disadvantages which it produces? Does she want protection for her iron? Her distance from the ocean secures it from foreign competition; upon her distilled spirits she may retain the existing duties, and no one will complain. For her hemp she does not need protection, such are her facilities of raising that production; the duty upon it must soon be nominal. The West has carried on a valuable trade with the South in live stock; and I will ask, if every advantage combined, which she derives from the tariff, is sufficient to compensate for the loss of this trade. The West wants population—then why should she support a system, which must prevent emigration, by concentrating population in the old States? Sir, with deference to the gentlemen who represent the West, I say, her best interests would be promoted by an amelioration of the tariff. If so, why does she not unite with the South in breaking the fetters of an iron policy, which is injurious to both?

If the New Englander complains that he can produce nothing for market on his cold and rocky soil, the bright and sunny fields of the South invite him to a more propitious clime; let him come, we will receive him as a brother, and make him a citizen. If he is without a home, the West and Southwest invite him to a land where, with moderate industry, he may become a freeholder, and have every domestic comfort smiling around him—but nature having denied to his section of country the blessings which she has so kindly showered upon the South, affords no reason why he should oppress us. This is not all; he oppresses us without enriching himself; for if the mass of the community have an interest in manufacturing, I am yet to learn it. Do manufacturers afford a market for the surplus productions of the farmer? To a limited extent they do; but this market is confined to neighborhoods, and is not general. Has the poor man capital to invest in manufactories? No; but if interested at all, it is only as a laborer. Then what, in New England, is the effect of the tariff? Its effect is not only to build up the fortunes of the few at the expense of the many, but, by increasing the price of articles which necessarily enter into the consumption of every family, to drain from the poor the means of their subsistence. Let us differ, sir, as much as we may, with regard to the policy of restricting commerce, or the constitutionality of taxing the Southern planter for the benefit of the Northern manufacturer, we must all concur in one opinion—of the inhumanity of those laws, which bear with a more than proportional hardship upon the poor and industrious.

It is useless to expect manufactories in this country to afford an adequate market for our raw produce, or to become the source of national wealth, until they are able to compete, upon equal terms, with the manufactories of other countries. This they cannot do, until the price of labor here is proportionate to the price of labor in Europe.

That labor is not as cheap in this country as in others, is to be attributed not more to our free institutions, than to natural causes. The territory of the United States is imperfectly settled; her forests are still uncleared, and much of her most fertile soil untrodden. In the cheerful walks of agriculture, the husbandman may find a sufficient employment, and a bountiful reward for his industry; while this continues the case, he will not desert his smiling and variegated fields for the gloom of a manufactory, nor exchange the proud independence of a landholder for the situation of a hireling.

This state of things will not always continue. When our forests shall have yielded to the axe of the husbandman; when the wilderness of the West shall be spotted with fields and villages; when generations shall have passed away, and busy millions of freemen teem on the shores of the far distant Pacific, then, and not till then, will manufactures flourish. Whenever there is a population in this country which cannot find employment in agriculture and commerce, less inviting pursuits will be sought for, and manufactories will arise without the aid of protecting laws, and flourish without taxing other branches of industry for their support.

So far, sir, from believing that any effectual relief will be extended at present to the depressed interests of the country, I have risen under the painful conviction that even the drawback which we ask on cotton bagging will be denied us. Do not, sir, understand me to intimate that there is a disposition in the majority of Congress to oppress the South; I entertain no such apprehension. But the friends of restriction are convinced that if the union of interests which at present binds them together, could once be broken, their system would fall under its own weight; they are thoroughly convinced, that if a single ingredient were lost out of that singular mixture of "cotton bagging, woollens, iron, salt, mill duck, and molasses," those interested in the remnant would not have the power to force so noxious a dose on the American people.

Sir, it cannot be concealed that a majority of this House have adopted the determination to curb, as much as possible, the discussion of this subject—a determination which leaves us nothing to hope, until the great mass of the people in the East or West are convinced that the restrictive system does not diffuse a general prosperity, and is only calculated to enrich the wealthy. I think there is most to hope from the people of the West, who, from their situation, the cheapness of land, want of population, and scarcity of money, combined, cannot, surely, long continue in the belief that they are in a condition to manufacture advantageously.

How long the South will wait for this change, I cannot say; it shows a high moral feeling and attachment to the Union, that her citizens have waited this long; it shows that when convinced that their best interests have been sacrificed at the shrine of the most infatuated doctrines (I say it with deference) that ever disgraced the councils of a nation, they have been unwilling to resist the measures of the General Government. Their forbearance has not proceeded from fear, but patriotism, from a love of country, which, so long as there is virtue and intelligence in the people, gives me hope that this Union will continue. But, to ensure this, no single set of men should direct our councils, or by their rapacity plunder the rest. If they do, this Union will indeed form a "rope of sand." God grant that this may not prove the case; but that the barriers of the constitution, which were intended to restrain the encroachments of the majority upon the rights of the minority, may be sacredly observed. Then, s'r, will the benefits of the American revolution extend its blessings to all future time: the tree of liberty which was then planted, will not only grow and flourish until it spreads its broad branches from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, but such may be the influence of our example, that perhaps it is not too much to hope the day will come, when all the nations of the earth shall repose under its shade.

[At the conclusion of his remarks, Mr. C. offered an amendment to the amendment, proposing to reduce the existing duties on salt and iron thirty per cent.]

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

GOODS DESTROYED BY FIRE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill "to remit duties paid on goods destroyed by fire," which had been reported some time ago from the Committee of the Whole, with an amendment to strike out the enacting clause (to destroy the bill.)

A long debate ensued on the merits of the case, of which the following is a very brief outline:

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, rose, and addressed the House in support of the bill, which he contended was justified by every principle of sound and honest policy. He quoted several precedents in the legislation of Congress, recognising the principle of the bill from the foundation of the Government. The intention of Government in imposing duties was [he said] that they should finally fall upon the consumers, although, in the first instance, they were paid by the importers. The goods in question were destroyed by fire; and the effect of retaining the duties paid on them would be, that the Government would recover the duties twice from the importers, for they would necessarily import again the same quantity which was destroyed. He then referred, in support of the principle of the bill, to laws allowing duties on stills destroyed to be refunded—to the bill retaining the duties on goods which were on board a ship captured during the war, while going into St. Mary's, Georgia, to the act remitting the duties on goods destroyed by fire at Savannah, &c. &c.

Mr. PEARCE opposed the bill. He said it would establish a bad precedent; and if the duties were remitted to the importer, they ought, on the same principle, to be remitted to the underwriter. He denied there was any analogy between this case and those cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He said the argument of the gentleman would lead to the conclusion that Government would guaranty all goods imported, which through neglect might be destroyed in the store, or which might be exported by coastwise navigation from the North to the South.

Mr. GOODENOW said, every principle of equity justified the passage of this bill, and that justice should be done without regard to its being quoted as a precedent hereafter.

Mr. CARSON expressed similar sentiments.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, the effect of the passage of this bill would be to encourage the importing merchants to neglect their business. He attributed the fact of this claim being made, to the remissness of the importer, who ought—as every merchant who knows his business does—to have insured his property. This was a case [he said] of gross and palpable negligence; and if the House should adopt the principle of the bill, we would have our tables crowded with memorials whenever a fire takes place in the United States. The merchants in the interior of the country had as good a right to claim a remission of duties on goods destroyed by fire as the importer.

Mr. GORHAM, in reply to the argument of Mr. C., that the importer ought to have insured his goods, stated, that part of them were imported only five days before the fire took place. The importer was consequently deprived of both a foreign and domestic market for the goods, which, if exported within a certain time, would have been entitled to drawback. He referred, in support of the principle of the bill, to several acts passed to remit moneys to collectors of the public taxes, &c. who had been robbed; to the case of Captain Hall, who had been robbed at Marseilles, in France; and to the case of Richard Smith, who had been collector of taxes in Michigan. He referred also to the bills remitting duties on goods destroyed by fire in Portsmouth, Norfolk, Savannah, &c.

Mr. McDUFFIE, in opposition to the bill, pursued the same line of argument as Mr. CAMBRELENG. If the importers ought to be released from the duties on goods destroyed by fire, he asked, what distinction was between them and the consumers? Where would the principle be limited? If the principle of the bill were adopted, [he said] it must be partial in its operation, and partial justice was the greatest injustice. He referred to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, of which Mr. Lowndes was chairman, made in 1807. It discountenanced the principle of this bill. He hoped that the bill would not pass.

Mr. SUTHERLAND spoke at length, in support of the bill.

Mr. CHILTON remarked that he was well satisfied the claim under consideration could not, under any principle of justice or safety, be allowed. He said, he witnessed with some sorrow the prodigal waste of time in urging questions upon the House evidently against its wish, and in opposition to that opinion which was already expressed in committee. He was apprised that much important business remained to be done, and that time was speedily passing away. To reject the bill, and to terminate the debate, he would move the previous question.

The call for the previous question was sustained, and the House agreed that the main question should be put, which set aside the amendment to strike out the enacting clause.

The question recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time, and was decided in the negative by yeas and nays as follows:

THE TARIFF.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. ANDERSON on the 10th instant.

The question recurred on the following amendment offered to the same by Mr. POLK: "And to allow also a drawback of four and a half cents per square yard on foreign cotton bagging, exported either in the original packages, or around the cotton bale, to any foreign country."

Mr. CAMPBELL rose to offer a substitute for the resolution and amendment, but, it not being in order, he withdrew it.

Mr. GORHAM moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "foreign cotton bagging, &c." and inserting the following:

"Cotton bagging made of hemp or flax, and used for securing bales of cotton when the cotton is exported from any State to any other State for consumption, or to any foreign port as merchandise.

"Also, to allow a drawback of three cents per pound upon all cordage and cables manufactured in the United States, and used in the rigging and equipment of ships and vessels in the ports of the United States; and four cents per pound when exported to foreign places as merchandise.

"Also, to provide that the wool brought into the United States from any foreign place, which shall not cost more than ten cents per pound at the place whence imported, may be imported free of duty.

"Also, to make suitable provision in said bill to guard against frauds, and to graduate the drawbacks, so directed to be paid, from time to time, in such manner, that the amount of drawback paid shall not (except as to cotton bagging) exceed the duties levied and intended to be countervailed."

Mr. GORHAM addressed the House for some time in support of his amendment, but had not concluded his remarks when the hour allotted for the consideration of resolutions expired.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate "for the relief of purchasers of public lands," together with the amendments reported to the same from the Committee on Public Lands. The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. VINTON, he made some remarks in explanation of it; and in conclusion he observed, that in order to ascertain the sentiments of the House in relation to the amendment, he would withdraw the two last sections of it, which contained the penal enactments. If the two first sections were rejected, [he said] he would renew his motion to amend the bill by adding the third and fourth sections.

Mr. CLAY said, he would vote against the amendment. He expressed his hearty concurrence in the two last sections of it.

Mr. IRVIN said he would vote in favor of the bill as reported from the committee. He hoped the amendment of his colleague [Mr. VINTON] would not prevail.

The question on the amendment to the amendment was decided in the negative.

Mr. VINTON then renewed his motion to add the third and fourth sections of the amendment he proposed.

Mr. CLAY expressed himself as favorable to the objects of this amendment.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, Mr. ISACKS, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. BAYLOR severally spoke in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MCCOY, Mr. BURGESS, and Mr. VINTON supported it.

The blanks in that part of the amendment offered by Mr. VINTON, which specifies the term of imprisonment and the amount of penalty, were filled up; the first with "two years," the latter with "one thousand dollars."

The question was then put on agreeing to the two sections offered by Mr. VINTON, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. DODDRIDGE moved to strike out the words "first August," and to insert in lieu thereof "fourth of July," in the first section of the bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. VINTON moved to amend the second section, by inserting after the words "possession of" in the eighth line, the following words: "And actually cultivated and improved by"—

This amendment was decided in the negative.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and with the bill to be read a third time.

[The bill subsequently passed, and was returned to the Senate; which body concurred in the amendments made in the House.]

TUESDAY, MARCH 16, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. ANDERSON, of Maine, on the 10th instant, of the amendment offered to the same by Mr. POLK, and of the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. GORHAM on the 15th instant.

Mr. GORHAM continued his remarks of yesterday in support of his amendment, and in conclusion moved to postpone the consideration of the whole subject, and make it the special order of the day for Tuesday next. He said his object in making this motion was to give gentlemen an opportunity of examining fully the whole question, which he considered one of the greatest importance, and requiring the most deliberate investigation. He hoped that no gentleman would move to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. EVANS, of Maine, said he did not know that he should be opposed to the postponement of the resolution for a few days, if desired by gentlemen for the purpose of reflecting upon the subject. He was, however, anxious to submit his views upon it, feeling, as he did, a strong solicitude for the fate of the resolution proposed by his colleague, [Mr. ANDERSON] and should prefer an earlier opportunity to do so than that named by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GORHAM.] He inquired if it would be in order for him now to discuss the general subject opened by the resolution and the proposed amendments.

The SPEAKER replied that it would not be in order.

Mr. E. then expressed a hope that the resolution and amendments would not be postponed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, the subject of drawbacks was one of great importance, and required deliberate consideration. He hoped, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER said, there was a better disposition to be made of this subject than a postponement of it. He moved to refer it to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to the gentleman from South Carolina that he would have as good an opportunity of offering any amendments he might think proper, when the subject was taken up as a special order of the day, as when it would be discussed in a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TUCKER said, there were other subjects to be considered besides those embraced in the amendments. He said he would persevere in his motion to refer the subject to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POLK trusted that the House would support the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He made a similar suggestion to Mr. TUCKER to that made by Mr. CAMBRELENG.

In reply to an inquiry made by Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, the SPEAKER said, if the resolution was made the special order of the day for Tuesday next, it could not be discussed beyond the usual hour devoted for considering resolutions.

Mr. IRWIN, of Pennsylvania, said, that, to prevent gentlemen from extending this discussion further, he would move to lay the resolution and amendments on the table.

On this motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and were as follows: yeas, 89—nays, 70.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 17, 1830.

THE JUDICIARY BILL.

The Judiciary bill was taken up in Committee.

Mr. DANIEL addressed the committee in support of his amendment and in reply to the arguments of the gentlemen from Connecticut; [Mr. HUNTINGTON and Mr. ELLSWORTH] but, before he concluded, the committee rose.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

On the motion of Mr. BATES, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WICKLIFFE in the chair, on the "bill declaratory of the act to provide for persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the revolutionary war."

Mr. CHILTON, in pursuance of the notice he gave when the bill was last before the House, offered a substitute for the whole bill. He said, if his substitute should fail, he would not oppose the bill, although he thought volunteers were as much entitled to the benefits of the pension system, as those who enlisted. His amendment embraced two principles; one to extend the benefits of the pension system to those who served in the State regiments and to volunteers; the other to extend it to those who served nine months, without regarding whether it was under one enlistment, as is now required.

Mr. BATES said that this bill was simply declaratory. It is intended to extend and to give full effect to the provisions of the law of 1818, to give the law a more liberal construction than that adopted by the War Department. He proposed to amend the original bill, by inserting in the first section of it the following words:

"If the whole amount of his property, exclusive of the house, building, and curtilage, by him occupied and improved, his household furniture, wearing apparel, the tools of his trade, and farming utensils, shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars, all debts from him justly due and owing being therefrom first deducted."

Mr. WILDE said, that while he was in favor of extending the bounties of Government to those who served their country during the revolutionary war, he thought the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, if it could succeed at all, would meet with more favor from the House if offered in a distinct and separate form. He inquired whether the militia regiments were included in the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BATES replied that they were not included. He offered a resolution on the 8th of January last, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the House in this particular, but no notice had since been taken of it.

Mr. CHILTON said, the adoption of the amendment would produce much uncertainty at the department, and Mr. BATES replied.

The question on the amendment proposed by Mr. BATES, was decided in the affirmative: yeas, 67—nays, 49.

Mr. SILL moved to amend the bill by adding to the first section of it the following words:

"And no applicant for a pension, under the provisions of this act, or of those acts of which it is declaratory, shall be required to show what his circumstances and condition in life were, or what property he was possessed of, at any time prior to the passage of this act."

The amendment having been read, Mr. SILL rose, and observed that he offered the amendment under a firm conviction that, without it, the bill would be ineffectual in affording the relief for which it was intended. He would endeavor to state, in a few words, [he said] the reasons which induced him to propose the amendment, and the object it was intended to effect. To explain his views, it would be necessary to take a short review of the pension laws, the intent and meaning of which this bill is intended to declare.

The first general act for the relief of the soldiers of the revolution, [said Mr. S.] was passed on the 18th day of March, 1818. This act, as well as that of 1820, is predicated on the principles of services rendered by, and necessity existing in the circumstances of, the applicant; they are intended for the relief of those who rendered meritorious services in the war of the revolution, and became reduced to such circumstances as rendered the aid of their country necessary for their comfortable subsistence. The act of 1818 made provision for all the survivors of the army of the revolution, who had served for the period of nine months, and, in the words of the act, "stood in need of the assistance of their country for support." This act was continued in force until the first day of May, 1820, when it was repealed, and its place supplied by the act of that date, under which applications for revolutionary pensions are now made.

It is possible that, under the operation of the first mentioned law, some cases of improper admissions on the pension roll might have occurred, and that this might have had some effect in producing its repeal. But, from looking into the reports of the proceedings of that day, I am confident that the principal causes of its repeal were the amount of the pension roll and the exhausted state of the public treasury. It was stated on that occasion that, at that time, the revenue of the country was not sufficient to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government, by an annual amount of more than three millions of dollars. This act is founded on the same principles as that of 1818, but appears to have been intended to restrict the operation of those principles, and limit the description of persons who shall be admitted to receive its benefits. It directs that the payment of all pensions granted by the act of 1818 shall be suspended, and that, before any further payments are made, the applicant shall comply with all the requirements of the act of 1820. By the terms of that law, the applicant is required to appear before some court of record, and exhibit an inventory of all his property, together with the circumstances and situation of himself and of each member of his family. A valuation of his property, founded on the testimony of disinterested persons, who have a knowledge of it, must be made by the judges of the court. The applicant is also required to declare, under oath, that he has not, since the act of 1818, conveyed away, or disposed of, any part of his property, with the intention of bringing himself under the provisions of that law. These proceedings are all filed of record in the court where the application is made, and a copy of them forwarded to the Secretary of War for his decision on the claim; and if, on examination, he shall be of opinion that the applicant is "in such indigent circumstances as to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country," he shall be entitled to receive a pension.

Different constructions, as it respects the circumstances and condition in life of the applicant, have been put upon this law. By the first construction that was adopted, the amount of property that an applicant was allowed to retain and receive, a pension was limited to three hundred dollars; during a short period, the sum was enlarged to one thousand dollars; but, before any beneficial effect was produced, this construction was abandoned, and the principle again adopted that the possession of property to the amount of more than three hundred dollars, however unproductive that might be, was sufficient to exclude an applicant from the benefits of the law. The bill now under consideration provides a remedy for this evil; it allows the applicant to retain property to the amount of one thousand dollars, exclusive of his household furniture and farming utensils. This, in my opinion, is a reasonable construction of the law. It never could have been the intention of the law to require an applicant to become a pauper before he could receive its benefits. But the regulations adopted by the War Department, in the application of this law, are such as to operate in many cases with extreme hardship, and exclude many meritorious claimants, for whose benefit the law was intended.

One would suppose that the provisions of this law, even if no additional requirement had been made by the War Department, were sufficiently guarded and severe; and, had nothing more than what appears to have been contemplated in the law been required, a compliance with those terms, although humiliating to the pride of a soldier, might not have been impracticable. But the regulations adopted in the application of the law are such that a compliance with them is, in many cases, not only difficult, but wholly impossible. The admission or rejection of an applicant frequently depends, not on his services, not on his poverty, which are the only considerations contemplated by the law, but on the adventitious circumstances of his ability to comply with the regulations of the department.

These regulations appear to be predicated on the presumption that every application is fraudulent. And in order to rebut that presumption, the applicant is required to do that which cannot reasonably be supposed to be within his power. He may prove that he performed the most meritorious services in the war of the revolution; that he served year after year in the most severe campaigns, and endured all the hardships and privations which were incident to the service. He may prove that himself, with a helpless and dependant family, are reduced to a state of the most extreme poverty and wretchedness, and that they are actually dependant on the charity of others for the means of their subsistence. He may show that he is actually the tenant of an alms-house. One would suppose that, under the most severe construction of the law, this ought to be sufficient to entitle him to receive the bounty of his country. But, it is not so. He may make full proof of those facts, and yet his claim be rejected; for by the regulations to which he is required to conform, he must also show the property, whether in money, lands, chattels, or claims, that he was possessed of on the eighteenth day of March, 1818, the time when the first pension law was passed. He must then trace out and exhibit all the changes, mutations, and dispositions of this property, and of every part and portion of it, from that period until the time of his application. If he has paid away any money, he must show to whom it was paid, and for what consideration. If he has paid any debts, he must show the origin of those debts, and for what they were contracted. In fine, he must make out a particular and detailed account of all his pecuniary transactions from the time of the passage of the law to the date of his application, which may amount to a period of ten or twelve years. And all this, too, must be verified, not only by his own oath, but by the testimony of every individual with whom he may have had any pecuniary transactions during the whole period of time.

It must, I think, be admitted, that, at the time these regulations were adopted, a compliance with them would, in many cases, be a matter of extreme difficulty. The applicant was then required to show all the changes and mutations in his property from the eighteenth day of March, 1818, to the first day of May, 1820, a period of more than two years. But it is manifest that, by the lapse of time, the difficulty of a compliance is constantly increasing. It might be possible to trace out and establish, by testimony, all those circumstances during a period of two years, when it might be wholly impracticable after the lapse of ten or twelve years.

How great and entire a change in the circumstances of individuals, does the period of ten or twelve years often witness. What numbers, during that period of time, are reduced from a state of competence to that of absolute penury and want; and yet how small a portion of that number could, if required, give such a statement of their circumstances as is required of the applicant for a pension! How few could render such an account of every pecuniary transaction as is required of the aged and infirm soldier, and be able to support every transaction by the testimony of witnesses! The artful and designing man, who divests himself of his property with a view to such an event, might make his arrangements so as to effect his purpose, while, to the honest and undesigning, it would be attended with much more difficulty. And thus does it often happen. The soldier of the revolution possesses an honest and manly pride, which revolts at the idea of asking, in the character of a mendicant, that to which he believes himself to be entitled as a matter of right. It is with him an act of the last necessity. He relies upon his own resources, and depends upon his own exertions, till the increasing infirmities of age, or some unexpected calamity, reduce him to a state of utter helplessness and want. Compelled at length, by hard necessity, he applies for the relief the pension laws afford. In answer to his application, he receives a copy of the regulations of the War Department, and is informed that a compliance with them is an indispensable prerequisite to his obtaining a pension. He examines the regulations: he has kept no account of his transactions with a view to such an event: those with whom he may have had pecuniary transactions are, many of them, beyond his reach: he finds it impossible to comply with what is required, and perhaps, after repeated and unsuccessful attempts, abandons his application in despair, and resigns himself to all the miseries of want, or avails himself of such relief as the hand of charity may afford. These statements are not made from reasoning or conjecture. They are the result of actual observation. The sphere of my observation is not very extensive, but I have actually known many instances similar to those I have attempted to describe. Now my object, by this amendment, is to obviate the hardships which this strict construction occasions. I am sensible that caution may be necessary to guard against attempts at imposition; and I have no objection to any degree of strictness in the inquiry into the circumstances and situation of an applicant; at least, it may be proper in the execution of the existing laws, although I think the laws ought to be more liberal and extensive in their provisions. But I do think it unmeasurable and hard to require of an aged veteran of the revolution that which, in many cases, is not only impracticable for him, but would be for almost any other individual in society. It must be obvious that the provisions of this bill, without the proposed amendment, would not remedy this evil. It would enlarge the number and description of those who would be entitled to admission on the pension roll, and so far its effects would be highly benefficial; but still every applicant would be subject to the same rules as are now established, and to all the inconveniences which are thus occasioned. This amendment is intended to remove these evils.

I have observed that the regulations to which I have alluded, appear to be founded on the presumption that every application for a pension was fraudulent; and against whom, I would ask, is this presumption made? Against the soldier of the revolution; against the followers of Washington—the men who fought the battles of our independence: they are made against the men to whom, under Divine Providence, we are indebted not only for every thing dear and valuable in our civil institutions, but for our very existence as a nation. They are made against the men who, in the darkest period of our revolutionary struggle, maintained the most unshaken fidelity to their country and its liberties. Men whom no threats could intimidate to desert, no bribes could induce to betray their country. And are these men, who devoted the prime and vigor of their days to the service of their country, when, in the decline of life, borne down with hardships and with age, they come forward to ask the small pittance allowed them, to be presumed to be guilty of an imposition on the Government, and required to do away that presumption by means which are entirely impracticable, or stand convicted of the charge, and turned away without relief? Why, if every surviving soldier of the revolution, whether rich or poor, should, for the few remaining years of his existence, receive a pension from this Government, it would be but a small part of the debt that is due them. And shall so much strictness, so much rigor, be exercised towards those who, oppressed by poverty and want, ask for that relief which is intended for them? Is it worthy a great and powerful nation to be so sparing of its ample means in relieving the wants of those to whose services and sufferings it is so much indebted?

I trust it will not be so considered. I hope that the amendment may prevail, and that the bill may pass. It will do much towards affording relief to those who devoted their best days to the service of their country, and are now lingering out a life of poverty and want. It will cheer and comfort the few remaining days of many an aged veteran of the revolution. Let us pass the bill, and let us do it quickly. Whatever is proposed to be done for their relief, ought to be done without further delay. Small is the number that now remain as objects of the gratitude and justice of their country; and death, the great leveller of all, is constantly making that number less.

The question on Mr. CHILTON'S substitute was decided in the negative.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended to the House.

THURSDAY, MARCH 18, 1830.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HUNT, from the committee appointed on the 19th January last, "to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States and Territories for the purpose of education, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives," made a report, accompanied by the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the first day of July, 1831, the nett proceeds of all sales of public lands, paid into the Treasury of the United States, shall be, and hereby are, appropriated to the use of the several States within this Union, and the Territories of the United States, for the purpose of education.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, the said nett proceeds shall, on the first day of July, annually, thereafter, be apportioned among and paid to the several States and Territories, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and including Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the numbers aforesaid shall be determined by the enumeration made in pursuance of the constitution; and also by an enumeration to be taken in the year 1835, and in every subsequent term of ten years, in the States of Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, and Missouri, and in such new States as shall be formed out of the Territories of the United States.

The bill was twice read, and committed.

Mr. MARTIN then presented the project of the minority of the committee. The bill which he offered was considered by that minority as the best which could be adopted, if any was to be adopted; but, at the same time, they entered their protest against the proposition altogether.

RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Retrenchment be instructed to report a bill, providing that whenever the first session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than one hundred and twenty days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of the said one hundred and twenty days; and that whenever the second session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than ninety days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of said ninety days.

After moving the resolution, Mr. McDUFFIE proposed to modify it so as to make it an inquiry into the expediency, &c.

Mr. WICKLIFFE adverted to a bill under the consideration of the Committee on Retrenchment in relation to this subject, on which a difference of opinion had existed, which prevented it from being reported. He, therefore, wished that the gentleman would not modify the resolution, but that he would leave it in the shape of an instruction, so that the sense of the House might be distinctly ascertained on the subject. He stated that no retrenchment more efficient in its character could be introduced than that proposed by the resolution.

Mr. McDUFFIE thanked the gentleman for the information he had given him, withdrew his proposition to modify, and moved that the consideration of the resolution be postponed till Monday. Agreed to.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

The House then took up the report of the committee on the bill declaratory of the act to provide for persons engaged in the land and naval service during the revolutionary war, which was reported with amendments.

[The following is the bill as it was reported from the Committee of the Whole House.]

"That in all cases, in which application has been or shall be made to the Secretary of War, by any person, to be placed on the pension list of the United States, under "the several acts to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the revolutionary war," and the granting of such application shall depend upon "the circumstances and condition in life," as is provided in and by the same acts, of him who so applies, the applicant shall be deemed and taken to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country, if the whole amount of his property, exclusive of the house, building, and curtilage, by him occupied and improved, his household furniture, wearing apparel, the tools of his trade, and farming utensils, shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars, all debts from him justly due and owing being therefrom first deducted. And no applicant for a pension under the provisions of this act, or of those acts of which it is declaratory, shall be required to show what his circumstances and condition in life were, or what property he was possessed of, at any time prior to the passage of this act.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the granting of said application shall depend upon the term of service, as is provided in and by the first section of the first act of the several acts aforesaid, such applicant shall be deemed and taken to have served "for the term of nine months, or longer," as the case may be, within the meaning and intent of the said last mentioned act; if his continuous service in the war of the revolution, on the continental establishment, was nine months, or longer, notwithstanding his enlistment may have been for a shorter term than nine months, and notwithstanding he may, at any time, and during any portion of his said term, have been taken and detained in captivity.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the regular troops of the several States of the United States, the enlisting and raising whereof was recommended or approved by the old Congress, shall be deemed and taken, within the meaning and intent of the acts aforesaid, to have been on the continental establishment; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to include in said class of State troops the militia of the several States."

Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, moved to amend the amendment made to the bill in the Committee of the Whole, yesterday, by striking out the following words: "the house, building, and curtilage, by him occupied and improved," so that the bill would provide for persons worth one thousand dollars, "exclusive of their household furniture, &c."

Mr. C. said he offered the amendment under the conviction that it was not the intention of gentlemen to pension those whose circumstances were, comfortable, and who were able to support themselves.

On this motion a long debate took place, in which Mr. BURGESS, Mr. BATES, Mr. WICKLIFFE, Mr. CARLSON, Mr. HUBBARD, Mr. CLARK, Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, Mr. POLK, Mr. BARRINGER, Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, and Mr. McDUFFIE, took part.

[The following were the remarks of Mr. HUBBARD.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of New Hampshire, said, it was not his purpose, at this time, to go into a very full consideration of this subject; but he would detain the House for a few moments, while he stated the reasons which would induce him to vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CRAIG] and support the bill and amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole. I have [said Mr. H.] ever been opposed to the contracted policy of the present pension system: I have ever been at war with what I have supposed to be the principle upon which that system is founded. The existing pension laws have been based on individual poverty and indigence, and not on actual services rendered, and on actual sacrifices made, in the cause of our country, during the period of our revolution.

In passing these laws, the Government have gone upon the principle that they were bestowing a gratuity, rather than discharging an obligation; and viewing these laws in this light, I never could give them my entire approbation.

It has been my uniform and firm belief that the services and the sacrifices of those who fought the battles of our country during our revolutionary struggle, laid a just foundation for a claim on the country; and that the provisions of our pension laws should be equally extended to all such, as a liquidation of their claim. It was the service of the faithful soldier that entitles him to a pension; and, whether rich or poor, he was equally the object of his country's justice.

The present laws are of a most invidious character; and the practical operations of them are most unjust. There are those in my own State, who were engaged in the same service during most of the war; who fought side by side under the operation of your pension laws: one is taken while another is left, one is poor while the other is not rich; one receives the bounty of his country, and from the other that bounty is withheld: and why is this difference? why this invidious, this mortifying distinction? Merely, sir, because one by his own prudence has been able to save a few hundred dollars for the comfortable support of himself and his family: merely, sir, because one by his own industry has been able to keep himself from the list of town paupers: merely, sir, because he has not been the object of public and private charity; while the other has, by a course of misfortune, or by a want of ordinary prudence, experienced the embarrassments and privations of poverty. And yet it has happened, that, in extending the bounty provided by the pension laws to those embraced within the last description, you have made their situation, in point of property, far more desirable than the situation of those who are excluded from a pension by the practical application of the same laws.

Such is the partial, unjust, and invidious operation of the present pension system.

I shall most cheerfully give my aid and my support to the bill and to the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole, for the reason that they are calculated to extend the benefits of the pension system; and that, if they shall be adopted, the cases of many meritorious soldiers will be embraced within their provisions. When a few more years shall have passed away, all those who are now, or who may, by the most liberal provisions of your laws, hereafter be placed on your pension list, will be numbered with the congregation of the dead; and then there will exist no necessity to make the annual appropriations for the fulfilment of the existing pension acts, which seem to be so peculiarly obnoxious to the gentleman of Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE.] That gentleman says he is opposed to the bill and the amendments, for the reason that they will tend to swell the pension list; for this reason, and for this reason alone, they meet with my entire approbation, and shall receive my most hearty support. I perfectly accord with the remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CARLSON.] To the whole of that faithful band of patriots, who performed the requisite term of service, in the war of the revolution, I would extend the benefits of the pension laws—I would do that as a matter of justice—could I have my will, I would not stop short; and, at all times, I shall feel disposed to give my best aid in the support of every measure which shall have for its object the extending the benefits of the pension system; which shall in effect place the greatest number of our revolutionary soldiers on the pension list. It would be but an act of justice to include every individual who has performed the requisite term of service. It would be but an honest discharge of our obligations to this meritorious class of our citizens.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] has further stated, that, if the amendment of the committee should be adopted by the House, it would of consequence greatly increase the amount of the appropriations for this object. It might be so; but that consideration should not deter us, if the measure is right: it cannot deter me from doing this act, which I deem but an act of perfect justice.

The number of revolutionary pensioners falls short of twelve thousand, and the number of invalid pensioners falls short of four thousand; and whether the number would or would not be increased, by passing the bill with the amendments now under consideration, I will not stop to inquire; for I cannot but consider this as a debt due to this faithful band of patriots, founded on services performed, and on sacrifices made, for this country during the war of our revolution; and it is alike due to all, no matter what may be his condition or circumstances in life. These being my views, and under the influence of these considerations, I cannot favor the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia; but shall most freely lend my aid to the most liberal extent and to the most liberal application of the pension system, until every faithful soldier of the revolution shall participate in the justice of the country; and if I cannot succeed, at this time, in accomplishing the extent of my wishes, I will do whatever my hands shall find to do, in furtherance of the object.

The first pension act was passed in 1818, and it offered encouragement to the remnant of that band of patriots who braved the storm of our revolution, to ask and to receive aid from their common country; and under this act many did ask, and many received; but in a short period an additional act was passed, which suspended the payment of every pensioner until he should make and forward to the department a schedule of his property, which should furnish the evidence that he was in such indigent circumstances as not to be able to support himself without the aid of public or of private charity; and only in such event, according to the construction which had been given to the act of 1818, could he be restored to the list. Under the act of 1820, many, very many faithful and meritorious soldiers were dropped from the list. And although subsequent explanations would have warranted the department in reinstating many of the applicants, yet such was also the construction given by authority to the act of 1820, that those who had been dropped could not be reinstated, which suggested the absolute necessity of the act of 1823; and under this last statute such rules and regulations have been established at the department, as in effect to exclude almost every applicant who is not numbered on the list of town or country paupers.

Sir, it has become indispensably necessary that some explanatory law should be enacted; and believing, as I do, that the bill with the amendments, recommended by the Committee of the Whole, will do more justice than has as yet been rendered, I shall give them my support.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, inquired of the Chair whether it would be in order to move to strike out the sum of one thousand dollars, and insert sixteen hundred instead of it.

The SPEAKER said it would not be in order to make a motion in the House to insert a higher sum than that which had been agreed to in the committee.

Mr. McDUFFIE then moved to amend the amendment just made, by adding to it the following proviso:

"Provided also, that all applicants who shall be worth less than two hundred dollars shall receive the full amount of the pensions herein provided; and that, for every hundred dollars more than three hundred which any applicant shall be worth, six dollars shall be deducted from the annual amount of the pension to which such applicant shall be entitled."

At the suggestion of Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, Mr. McDUFFIE modified his proposition, by changing the sum to three hundred dollars.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he would oppose this amendment, for the obvious reason that it would tend to produce fraud and perjury, since it held out an encouragement, to every applicant for a pension, to reduce his property as low as three hundred dollars. It would give him six dollars per every hundred he reduced the value of his property.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, he was astonished that a gentleman of so much sagacity as Mr. B. did not discover that the same objection lay against the bill itself.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, the only difference was, that the temptation to commit perjury was, according to his [Mr. McD.'s] proposition, sevenfold greater.

Mr. ELLSWORTH opposed the amendment. It was [he said] too much refined for any practical purposes.

Mr. BURGESS also opposed it.

The question was then put, and taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative--124 to 56.

Mr. WICKLIFFE offered the following amendment, to be added to the first amendment of the Committee of the Whole:

"Provided also, that the provisions of the bill of 1818 shall be construed to extend to the officers and soldiers who served under General George Rogers Clarke in his expedition against the posts at St. Vincents and Kaskaskias, and the officers and soldiers who served nine months at any one time in the State or continental service during the war of the revolution, in the quarter or wagonmaster's department, though they were not of the line of the army."

The question on Mr. WICKLIFFE's proposition was decided in the negative.

Mr. MARTIN then moved to amend the bill by inserting, at the end of the amendment of the committee to the first section of the bill, the following words:

"And all such as were engaged in service under the command of Francis Marion, Thomas Sumter, and Andrew Pickens, of South Carolina, whether during their command as colonels or brigadier generals."

He subsequently modified his proposition, by adding to it the following words, at the instance of Mr. WAYNE:

"And all such as were in service for the time stated in this act, under Colonels John Twigg, Elijah Claude, and James Jackson, in the State of Georgia."

Mr. CHILTON moved an adjournment, which was refused.

The amendment proposed by Mr. MARTIN, as modified, was rejected.

The question being stated on the amendment offered yesterday in committee, by Mr. SILL, and agreed to,

Mr. HOWARD suggested that it was in conflict with the provisions of the act of 1820, prescribing the oath to be taken by persons claiming pensions.

To obviate this difficulty, verbal modifications were proposed by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, and Mr. BURGESS.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR submitted the following—to strike out the third section of the bill, and to insert these words:

"Provided, that the oath prescribed by the act of 1820, entitled 'An act in addition to an act entitled an act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the revolutionary war, passed the eighteenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen,' shall be so far varied as to apply to the date of the passage of this act, instead of the time in said act specified."

Mr. SILL offered the following proviso, which he thought would meet the views of the gentleman:

"But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to dispense with the oath required by the act of 1820."

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, approving of this proviso, withdrew the amendment he offered; and

The question on thus amending the amendment was decided in the affirmative.

The amendment to the amendment was then agreed to. The amendments of the committee having been gone through,

Mr. CHILTON then moved to amend the whole bill as amended, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following as a substitute:

"That the provisions of the pension laws of the United States, which are now in force, shall be, and the same are hereby, so extended as to embrace, upon the same principles, and under the same rules and regulations as to testimony, such troops as fought in the State lines, or belonged to the volunteer corps, having served at one or more periods, for the term of nine months, and to the draughted militia of the several States."

Mr. CARSON moved an adjournment, which was refused.

Mr. CHILTON then proceeded to explain his amendment for a short time, but the impatience of members (it being then past five o'clock) induced him to renew the motion to adjourn. But the House refused to adjourn. Yeas, 82—nays, 102.

Mr. CHILTON then asked for the yeas and nays on the question upon the substitute he offered.

Mr. DWIGHT said, he thought it was but reciprocating the courtesy extended by Mr. C. to the House in not trespassing on their attention, when he discovered their reluctance to hear him, that they should indulge him, [Mr. C.] by agreeing to have the question taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLER then called for the previous question, which was seconded. Yeas, 95—nays, 72.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the previous question. Another motion to adjourn was made, which was unsuccessful.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the previous question, and it was decided in the affirmative—92 to 85.

On the main question, "Shall the bill and amendments be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading," the yeas and nays were ordered, and were as follows:

FRIDAY, MARCH 19, 1830.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. SWIFT, was taken up for consideration.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to cause to be selected a suitable site for building fortifications on some point or island on Lake Champlain, near the line which divides the United States from Lower Canada; and also to cause correct surveys, plans, and estimates to be made for building fortifications on such site, and to make report thereof to this House at the next session of Congress."

Mr. SWIFT made a few remarks explanatory of his motives for offering the resolution—the necessity of which existed for some defensive work on Lake Champlain, from its present exposed condition, for the protection of the commerce of the lake, and for military purposes in case of war, &c. &c.

Mr. DRAYTON had no objection to the object of the resolution, but thought it would be better for the present merely to institute an inquiry into the expediency of the object; and he therefore moved to amend the resolution so as to make it read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inquire into the expediency of causing to be selected a suitable site for building fortifications on some point or island on Lake Champlain, near the line which divides the United States from Lower Canada; and of causing correct surveys, plans, and estimates to be made for building fortifications on such site, and to make report to this House at the next session of Congress of what has been done under this resolution.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to report thereon to the House. He was opposed to the proposition as it stood. It might be considered as the beginning of a new system of fortifications for the interior frontier; and he asked if the nation was prepared to go into such a system. The resolution was the commencement of a system of fortifications for the northern boundary. It was just as proper to fortify the northwestern frontier, and round to the southwestern. He thought it unnecessary. The best defence was the strong arms and the stout hearts of the people; but, if the subject was to be inquired into at all, it had better go to the committee, and let them report a proper resolution.

Mr. MALLARY opposed the reference. The proposition was very simple, and required little expense. The frontier in question was peculiarly situated, and required some measures for its defence. He pointed out the peculiar circumstances, growing out of its exposed condition, and its importance, both as to the extensive commerce on the lake, and its importance during a war with the adjoining country, which rendered it highly proper to have a fortified position on the lake. There was, at least, nothing unreasonable or unjust in the proposition; no appropriation was asked now, and he was surprised at the opposition to it. Gentlemen might talk of strong arms and stout hearts, but they were often inefficient without the aid of other means, and would be insufficient to protect the commerce of the lake from depredation. He hoped the motion would not prevail.

The question on committing the resolution being put, there appeared to be no quorum in the House, the votes being 52 to 52.

Mr. SWIFT said, the resolution did not direct any fortification to be erected, but merely required surveys to be made, for the future guidance and decision of Congress, if it should see fit to order a fortification. The inquiry had been sent to the Military Committee heretofore, and they asked to be discharged from it, because they were without sufficient information on the subject. It was to supply this information that he proposed his present resolution. He dwelt on the expediency of a defensive work on the lake, and said, if gentlemen would recollect what took place in that quarter during the late war, they would see the necessity of it.

The hour here elapsed for the consideration of resolutions.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

The engrossed bill explanatory of the revolutionary pension laws, (establishing a construction of those laws more liberal than they receive from the Secretary of War,) was read a third time, and the question stated on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, rose, and said, after the very full discussion of the bill yesterday, and the decided majority which appeared in its favor, it would be inexcusable in him now to consume the time of the House with an argument on the merits of the bill. But this was as proper a time as any to try the sense of the House on the question of providing for the militia of the revolutionary war, as well as the regular soldiers of the revolution. He should, therefore, move to recommit the bill, with instructions to incorporate such a provision in it. If either of these classes of troops were to be provided for alone, Mr. W. avowed that he had no hesitation in saying he would give the preference to the militia, because they entered the service from different and higher motives, and were of very different materials. He would, however, abstain from any debate, and content himself with simply making his motion, which he hoped would not be cut off by the previous question, as was the case yesterday; and on his motion he called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BATES opposed the motion. The only effect of it would be to defeat this bill, for every bill which had embraced the provisions proposed, had sunk. If the House was in favor of such a proviso, it could be introduced hereafter in a separate bill; but he protested against endangering the bill by this provision.

Mr. BELL reprehended warmly the mode pursued by the majority, in cutting off debate and amendment, and forcing the bill through.

He asserted and maintained at considerable length the merits of the militia of the revolution, and their claims to reward, if any part of the revolutionary soldiers were provided for; condemned the plan so manifestly pursued, of getting the pension system extended gradually by detachments, from a fear that it would not go down all at once; and avowed and explained his objections to the original pension act of 1818, on account of its unjust and invidious discriminations between the different classes which served in the revolutionary war, and excluding the most meritorious, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said, at an early period of this session he had the honor to introduce a resolution, which was passed by the House, instructing the Committee on Military Pensions to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill, that in all applications for pensions under the act "to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the revolutionary war," the fact of making application should be conclusive evidence that the circumstances of the applicant were so reduced that he needed assistance from his country for support.

The original act, [said Mr. T.] providing relief for the suffering remnant of our revolutionary warriors, was passed in 1818. Since that period, the tide of time has carried on its bosom to the ocean of eternity the venerable Bloomfield, the father of that act, and thousands of his companions in arms, to whom it was intended to afford assistance in their declining years. The surviving remnant stand in the midst of posterity, and look to Congress for justice. The stout hearts and strong arms, whose valor won our independence, and laid the broad foundation of all our power, and wealth, and prosperity, have a right to demand that in our high estate we should not be unmindful of their sacrifices and sufferings. They have a right to expect that they, too, will be cheered in the evening of their days by the beams of our national glory. To us they look as the depository of that power which alone is competent to remove the odious discrimination heretofore existing between those whose services were equal. Justice requires that soldiers who shared alike one common danger, should enjoy alike the same reward. If it depended on my vote, the disgusting and vexatious forms of inventories, valuations, and oaths of poverty should be abolished. I consider the law requiring them a disgrace to our statute book. It found its way there not only against my consent, but without the support of a majority of the whole number of the House of Representatives which passed it. The votes were, for the bill, eighty, against it, seventy-two—thirty-five members being absent. In my judgment, the only inquiry should be was the applicant a faithful soldier of the army of independence for the period of time established by law? If this fact was found in his favor, he should be entitled to receive payment whenever he chose to claim his portion of the debt. Such is the spirit, and such was the intention of the act of 1818. It authorized no court to subject the aged warrior to an inquisitorial examination in regard to his property. It required from the judge no other certificate than that the applicant's service was for a requisite time. Had it been intended by the framers of that law to limit its provisions to paupers, a tribunal would have been created to ascertain who were such, and report to the Secretary of War. No such thing was proposed or suggested. From the amendments moved, and speeches made, while the bill was under discussion in Congress, it is manifest that it was designed to embrace all whose declining years or reduced circumstances required assistance, to enable them to live in the degree of comfort suited to the character and merits of soldiers, whose intrepidity and endurance—whose heroic daring and patient toil had won the highest prize for which man ever fought. Great as are the blessings which America, Europe, and even Africa, have already enjoyed in consequence of their achievements, nothing short of prophetic vision can foretell the glorious results of their unexampled deeds, which futurity shall unfold, for ameliorating the condition of mankind. It was for these men, the impress of whose exalted virtues was stamped on the age dignified by their actions, that the law of 1818 was passed. From one of them,* residing in my own district, and personally known to me from my youth, as a worthy and honorable man, I have recently received a letter, from which I beg leave to read an extract.

"Forty-six years ago this day, I received an honorable discharge from the service of my country. I tried to serve it faithfully between three and four years, and I should be loath to believe that I was a hard bargain for Congress. I have been industrious since that time. In more than twenty years I have not drank ardent spirits. I have always been temperate. What little property I have, has been procured by hard labor, and in no other way. I feel the effects of age, yet I must labor hard, or I cannot, with my little farm, make the two ends of the year meet. I have stood a sentinel at the door of the beloved Washington's habitation many an hour. Many a day has been spent in harder duty than that of watching for a good man. Congress must know what kind of cash old soldiers were paid off in. President Jackson says in the message you sent me, that the United States will soon be out of debt. The Government is rich; old soldiers are poor, but, thank God, not all of them beggars: I will not beg of the United States. A revolutionary soldier should scorn it. It is as unnatural as it would be to see a worthy father begging of a son. There are hundreds still living like me, or more worthy. They have been industrious and temperate when working for themselves, and while achieving the independence of our country. We ask for justice. Pay us what we lost by bad money, and the interest of it, and my old bones need not ache so often from hard labor. I had hoped President Jackson would have recommended something better than an extension of the benefits of the pension law to those who are unable to maintain themselves in comfort. Have not 'these relics of the war of independence' some stronger claims upon their country than 'gratitude and bounty?' For one, I say give us justice, before President Jackson or any other man talks of 'bounty.'"

I present this worthy soldier as a sample of those whom I understood to be embraced in its provisions, when we passed the act of 1818. If none were intended to be included but paupers, it ought to have been entitled An act to relieve cities and towns from the support of old soldiers. But such was not its only object; while it included these,

Daniel Couch, Esq. of Milton.

it did not exclude small farmers, mechanics, and laborers. The amount of the annuity itself is conclusive evidence that it was not designed to grant full support to the old soldier and his family. If so, it would have been greatly enlarged. But it was thought it would enable him, with what other means he might chance to possess, to eke out a comfortable subsistence, and enjoy in age the quiet and repose so well earned by his youthful exertion. It was not expected those in affluence would avail themselves of the pecuniary assistance it proffered to others; but when it was objected on the floor of this House, that the rich might take advantage of it, the venerable Bloomfield replied, it is better some few should receive assistance, who can live comfortably without it, than subject all to degrading conditions. None can receive it unless they serve for the specified time.

Such, Mr. Speaker, according to my understanding, was the object of the original act. Let us now inquire how that object was carried into effect by its administrators; and I am greatly mistaken if, in the sequel, it will not appear that the Executive department, to which the duty of executing it was confided, not only gave to it a most rigid construction, and established severe and unreasonable regulations, tending to excite many for whose benefit it was passed, but actually rejected numerous classes of applicants, clearly embraced by both its letter and spirit.

To substantiate a claim under the act of 1818, as passed by Congress, it was necessary to prove service until the end of the war, or for the term of nine months, or longer, at any period of the war. Enlistment for nine months was not required. But the Department of War required not only proof of continued service for nine months, but, setting up its authority above the law, and against the law, required proof of enlistment for nine months, as well as service. This usurpation of legislative power by the Executive department, excluded unjustly—first, all who enlisted for six or eight months, and, before the expiration thereof, re-enlisted for either period, making a continuous service varying from twelve to sixteen months. Secondly, all who, at the expiration of the time for which they enlisted, were induced by the earnest appeals of their officers, to continue in service a longer time, until recruits arrived to supply their places, although the aggregate time exceeded nine months. In the exigencies of the revolutionary war, it not unfrequently happened that the very existence of the army depended on the patriotic and voluntary service of the soldiers, after they were entitled to their discharge. Thirdly, all whose enlistment being short of nine months, were taken prisoners and confined in dungeons and prison ships, so long as to complete more than nine months. The wrongs of these three classes are still unredressed. Many of them have gone to their graves, and are beyond our power to do them right. The living, who have borne up under our injustice, are older and feebler by twelve years than they were when we passed the law providing for them a relief, which, up to this day, the Department of War refuses to extend to them. They will die unredressed, unless we do them justice.

I have said that the severe and unreasonable regulations established at the department, exclude many meritorious claims. Bear with me, I pray you, while I state a case or two in illustration of this remark. Whenever it occurs, owing to the loss or destruction of the rolls, that there is no record evidence in the department, proving the enlistment and service, it must be supported by the oath of the party and two disinterested witnesses. It often happens that only one can be found. The others are dead, or removed, the soldier knows not where. Half a century makes frightful ravages among the rank and file of any army. That one witness, however, is above reproach, unimpeached and unimpeachable, in a life of threescore years and ten—disinterested in the question—accurate in his description of time, place, and circumstances—a man on whose testimony a jury would convict of murder, and a court sentence to execution; yet the oath of the old soldier, corroborated by the testimony of such a witness, is held insufficient, and he is spurned from the door of the department like a perjured knave.

Again: It often occurred, after a well fought field, that the hospital of the army, if, indeed, it was fortunate enough to have any thing deserving the name, was crowded with the wounded to such a degree that removal and careful nursing afforded the only hope of recovery. The heart of a father, yearning for tidings of his only son, directs his steps to the camp. He has heard of the battle and of the laurels won, and he knows that laurels grow on a blood-stained soil. He finds his son has not disgraced the name of his sire, who, on the plains of Abraham, fought by the side of the gallant and intrepid General Wolf. But he finds him dangerously wounded, and, rejoicing to find him even thus, obtains for him a furlough for two or three months, by which time it is hoped he may recover, and again join his corps. Meanwhile his regiment changes its position. It is ordered from Monmouth to Yorktown. The wounded soldier languishes longer than was expected. Application for a renewal of his furlough cannot be made. The term expires, and he is marked as a deserter. The war closes; distance, and poverty, and removals intervene to prevent further attention to the matter. At length he recovers, and in old age applies for the measure of relief to which he considers himself entitled. Then, for the first, he discovers the deep disgrace affixed to his name. After many weary journeys, he is fortunate enough to procure evidence, admitted by the officers of the department to establish the truth of these facts to their satisfaction as men; but yet he is denied his pension, on the ground that no evidence can be received to contradict the record. He is there marked as a deserter, and as a deserter he must die. The infamy must cling to his name, and descend to his posterity.

Sir, I will not weary you and this House by calling up the disgusting detail of the many examples of injustice which have come to my knowledge, owing to the severe and unreasonable regulations of the department. Those I have stated will serve to show the spirit in which the act has been executed. Would they were pictures of fancy instead of grave realities. But they are not. The files of this House, the petitions on your table, show they are not.

I now proceed briefly to notice another rule of construction, which has unjustly excluded a large class of meritorious soldiers from the assistance intended to be provided for them by Congress. When the act of 1818 was passed, it was understood to embrace the regular troops of all the States, who served continuously for nine months, the raising whereof was in pursuance of resolutions of the continental Congress. But the ingenuity of the department soon discovered there was a class of troops enlisted for periods varying from nine months to three years, under the recommendation of the old Congress, who served and suffered with the continentals, and, in all respects, performed continental duty, but who were not, by name, placed on the continental establishment. This discovery was followed by a rejection of all these claims. Even the few names of this class which had been admitted, under the first and more reasonable construction, were erased from the rolls. The hardship of their case will be apparent, if we consider that the only plain and generally understood distinction was that which existed between continentals on the one hand and militia on the other, between enlisted soldiers and draughted or detached militia. The officers might know, for they had an interest in knowing, whether they were technically on the continental establishment, but to the soldier it was immaterial, and therefore indifferent. The advancement of the cause, the term and nature of the service, and the character of his officers, were the only considerations of moment to him. Moreover, it often happened that officers in one campaign were technically continentals, and, in the next, not technically continentals, although enlisting regular troops to do continental duty, pursuant to resolutions of the continental Congress.

Revolutionary Pensioners.

This was the case with Colonel Willet, of New York, and I know not how many of his subaltern officers. Why, then, should his soldiers be excluded? To my mind there is no satisfactory reason for the discrimination. The third section of this bill abolishes it, and admits them to the same privileges which are enjoyed by their companions.

Perhaps it may be said that the regulations of the department, under the act of 1818, were acquiesced in by Congress, and ought not now to be condemned. Call to mind, sir, the circumstances under which that acquiescence took place. The heavy importations of 1815 and 1816 replenished the treasury to overflowing; but they were followed by great commercial distress and financial embarrassment. The act of 1818 had scarcely gone into operation when the treasury experienced an alarming diminution of revenue. The pressure began to be felt in 1819. The next year it became so severe that we were obliged to borrow three millions of dollars, to meet the ordinary appropriations for the support of Government; and the year following we were compelled to make a loan of five millions of dollars for the same purpose. The pensioners were more numerous than had been anticipated, and they were found to reside chiefly in the Northern States. Their demands on the treasury were unexpectedly large, and were considered onerous. Retrenchment became the order of the day. One million per annum was saved by reducing the army from ten to six thousand, and another million by the disgraceful act of 1820, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled an act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the revolutionary war;" but being, in fact, a repeal of that act, in regard to many persons for whose benefit it was intended. That act prohibited any pensioner, under the act of 1818, receiving his pension, until he exhibited, on oath, an inventory of all he possessed; and authorized the Secretary of War to strike from the list of pensioners any person who, in his opinion, was not in such indigent circumstances as to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country.

Every thing was confided to the discretion of the Secretary of War, and he exerted it in a spirit of severity suited to the pressure of the times. None but paupers were left on the rolls; all were stricken off who could live without public or private charity. Thus the boasted act of 1818, that noble act of national justice and gratitude, was converted into a law to relieve cities and towns from the support of certain indigent soldiers. That act also received a construction which wrought great injustice to many old soldiers; a person once stricken from the rolls, was considered forever debarred. Although his little property had been sold to pay his honest debts, and he had become the tenant of an almshouse, the Secretary of War turned a deaf ear to his petition. This injustice continued until March, 1823, when it was corrected by Congress, on condition, however, that the pensions should thereafter commence, not from the time of application, but of completing the testimony.

Thus matters remained, until the late Secretary of War, General Porter, came into office. He revised the rules established by his predecessors; and being of opinion that an old soldier, whose private income did not exceed eight dollars a month, perhaps with an aged wife and a helpless family, did need assistance, he decided accordingly, and amended the rules. The House of Representatives, at the last session, confirmed his decision, by a vote of great unanimity; and yet it was among the first acts of this administration to denounce that decision, and to re-establish the old rule, under the pretext that General Porter's amendment was an act of legislation. If the amendment was legislation, what was the establishment of the original rule? I leave it to others to reconcile the President's denunciation of General Porter's decision with the recommendation in his message "to review the pension law for the purpose of extending its benefits to every revolutionary soldier who aided in establishing our liberties, and who is unable to maintain himself in comfort."

The gentleman from North Carolina [MR. WILLIAMS] wishes to amend this bill so as to provide pensions for the militia, and for this purpose he moves its recommitment. If the gentleman is really a friend of the old soldiers, I think he cannot fail to be convinced of the inexpediency of pressing his motion. In the first place, this bill, in its title and enactments, proposes no new legislation; it professes nothing more than to restore the pension laws to their original meaning. It is declaratory of the true intent of the act of 1818, and of the construction which ought rightfully to be given to it. New provisions, therefore, are inapplicable to this bill. Secondly, the Committee on Military Pensions have, in another form, reported in favor of the militia, and their report is under the consideration of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. When that report comes up, the principles on which relief should be extended to them can be discussed and settled. Thirdly, the bill which passed this House last session, embracing the militia, failed in the Senate, as it is understood, because it was apprehended it would seriously embarrass the operations of the treasury. If we conform this bill to that, we have no reason to anticipate for it a different fate. If we cannot do all the good we desire, let us endeavor to do all we find practicable. By attempting too much, we shall endanger the whole.

The gentleman from Tennessee [MR. BELL] thought proper to institute a comparison between the merits of the continental soldiers and the militia; and he gave the preference decidedly to the latter. Far be it from me to derogate aught from the merits of the militia. They were brave and patriotic, and accomplished all that militia could be expected to effect. I am willing to reward them, and will manifest that willingness when the report in their favor comes up for consideration. Some of the most brilliant achievements of the war were theirs, and are worthy of all praise; but why was it necessary for the gentleman from Tennessee, in eulogizing the militia, to degrade the regular army? Why did he apply to them the odious epithet "mercenary?" Were they mercenaries? Did they exchange the employments of civil life for the privations and sufferings of a camp from mere mercenary motives? How were they paid? In worthless rags. How were they fed? With rations inferior in quality, and insufficient in quantity. History informs us that "in January and February, 1778, the army at Valley Forge was, more than once, absolutely without food. Even while their condition was less desperate in this respect, their stock of provisions was so scanty, that there was seldom at any time in the stores a quantity sufficient for the use of the troops for one week."

Again: In the year 1780, Gen. Washington thus wrote to Gen. Schuyler: "Since the date of my last, we have had the virtue and patience of the army put to the severest trial. Sometimes it has been five or six days together without bread; at other times as many days without meat; and, once or twice, two or three days without either. At one time, the soldiers ate every kind of horse food but hay."

How were they clothed? Let General Washington's letter to Governor Livingston, in 1773, answer: "Our difficulties and distresses are such, as wound the feelings of humanity. Our sick, naked! our well, naked! our unfortunate men in captivity, naked!" "The want of tents for summer, and clothes for winter, crowded the hospitals with sick, from whence an unusual number were daily conducted to the grave."

Revolutionary Pensioners.

[H. of R.]

"The returns of the 1st of February, 1778, exhibited the astonishing number of three thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine men in camp, unfit for duty, for want of clothes; of this number, scarcely a man had a pair of shoes. Even among those returned capable of doing duty, very many were so badly clad, that exposure to the colds of the season must have destroyed them. Although the total of the army exceeded seventeen thousand men, the effective rank and file amounted to only five thousand and twelve."

The committee of Congress, which about this time examined the condition of the army, wrote as follows:

"Notwithstanding the diligence of the physicians and surgeons, of whom we hear no complaint, the sick and dead list has increased one-third in the last week's returns, which was one-third greater than the week preceding, and, from the present inclement weather, will probably increase in a much greater proportion. Nothing can equal their sufferings, except the patience and fortitude with which the faithful part of the army endure them."

"The want of wagons and horses, for the ordinary as well as the extraordinary occasions of the army, presses upon us, if possible, with equal force. Almost every species of camp transportation is performed by men, who, without a murmur, patiently yoke themselves to little carriages of their own making, or load their wood and provisions on their back."

The regular army of the revolution, mercenaries! Oh no; purer and holier motives warmed their bosoms and nerved their arms.

The opinion of General Washington, in regard to the relative importance of regulars and militia, is well known. In a letter to Congress, of September, 1776, he thus wrote: "To place any dependance upon militia, is assuredly resting upon a broken staff. Men just dragged from the tender scenes of domestic life, unaccustomed to the din of arms, totally unacquainted with every kind of military skill, which, being followed by a want of confidence in themselves when opposed to troops regularly trained, disciplined, and appointed, superior in knowledge and superior in arms, makes them timid, and ready to fly from their own shadows. Besides, the sudden change in their manner of living, particularly in their lodging, brings on sickness in many, impatience in all, and such an unconquerable desire of returning to their respective homes, that it not only produces shameful and scandalous desertions among themselves, but infuses the like spirit in others. Again, men accustomed to unbounded freedom and no control, cannot brook the restraint which is indispensably necessary to the good order and government of an army; without which licentiousness and every kind of disorder triumphantly reign. To bring men to a proper degree of subordination is not the work of a day, a month, or a year; and unhappily for us, and the cause we are engaged in, the little discipline I have been laboring to establish in the army under my immediate command, is in a manner done away by having such a mixture of troops as have been called together within these few months." After stating other objections against a reliance on the militia, which I will not detain the House with reading, General Washington proceeds: "These, sir, Congress may be assured, are but a small part of the inconveniences which might be enumerated and attributed to militia; but there is one that merits particular attention, and that is the expense. Certain I am, that it would be cheaper to keep fifty or a hundred thousand men in constant pay, than to depend on half the number, and supply the other half occasionally by militia. The time the latter is in pay, before and after they are in camp, assembling and marching, the waste of ammunition, the consumption of stores, which, in spite of every resolution and requisition of Congress, they must be furnished with or sent home, added to other incidental expenses consequent upon their coming and conduct in camp, surpass all idea; and destroy every kind of regularity and economy which you could establish among fixed and settled troops, and will in my opinion prove, if the scheme is adhered to, the ruin of our cause." Again: "Experience, which is the best criterion to work by, so fully, clearly, and decisively reprobates the practice of trusting to militia, that no man who regards order, regularity, and economy, or who has any regard for his own honor, character, or peace of mind, will risk them upon militia."

Again: "Militia might possibly do it (that is, check the progress of the enemy) for a little while; but in a little while also, the militia of those States which were frequently called upon, would not turn out at all, or would turn out with so much reluctance and sloth as to amount to the same thing. Instance New Jersey! Witness Pennsylvania! Could any thing but the river Delaware have saved Philadelphia? Could any thing be more destructive of the recruiting business than giving ten dollars bounty for six weeks' service in the militia, who come in, you cannot tell how; go, you cannot tell when; and act, you cannot tell where: who consume your provisions, exhaust your stores, and leave you at last in a critical moment."

The sagacious author of the life of General Washington, in commenting on the condition of public affairs at the close of the year 1777, writes thus: "The problem whether a nation can be defended against a permanent force, by temporary armies, by occasional calls of the husbandman from his plough to the field, was already solved; and, in its demonstration, the independence of America had nearly perished in its cradle. All thoughts were now directed to the creation of an army for the ensuing campaign, as the only solid basis on which the hopes of the patriot could rest."

Was there any thing in the experience of the last war to disprove the conclusions of Washington and Marshall? Nothing. I see around me many experienced officers who can confirm their every word—who have in this House confirmed their every word on more occasions than one. The legislation of Congress during the last war confirms it. When it was found that a bounty of eight, sixteen, and forty dollars in cash, and one hundred and sixty acres of land, were insufficient to fill the ranks of the army, we raised it to one hundred and twenty-four dollars in cash, and three hundred and twenty acres in land; and if the war had continued, we should have been compelled to resort, and would have resorted, to the much abused system of conscription. The bill which it became my duty to report in 1814, as chairman of the Committee on the Militia, authorizing the President to compel the militia to serve six months after their arrival at the place of rendezvous, encountered sharp opposition as well from the friends as the enemies of the war. By a leading member of the former, who himself was a general of militia, it was proposed in committee, and urged with great zeal, to reduce the term from three to two months, instead of enlarging it from three to six.

I have dwelt on this part of the subject longer than I intended, and perhaps longer than was necessary: a sufficient apology will, I trust, be found in the degrading epithet applied to the army by the gentleman from Tennessee.

I pray gentlemen, before they make up their minds to vote against this bill, to consider the situation of those for whom it provides assistance. Their age—most of them have passed the period ordinarily allotted to human life. Few are under threescore years and ten, and many are over fourscore years. Their infirmities—bending under the weight of years, and hardships, and sufferings, they are illy able to endure the toil of daily labor. Their necessities—the bill embraces none in affluence: none who are removed more than one degree above absolute want: the owners of a house and a little land which they themselves are unable to work, and the produce of which is insufficient to pay the wages of hired hands. Shall we withhold from them the compensation due to their meritorious services, until their creditors have turned them out of doors, and reduced them to beggary? In all the prosperity of our beloved country, shall they alone go unrewarded; who, amidst the perils of hunger and thirst, and nakedness and the sword, established its broad foundation, and cemented it with their precious blood? I shall not begrudge--the constituents of no honorable member on this floor will begrudge, the appropriations of treasure which this bill may require. Would that the suffering remnant who may partake of its benefits were greater. I regret their numbers are so few. God grant that those who survive may long live, and enjoy in comfort the reward of their virtue and valor.

Mr. SPEIGHT moved to amend the amendment by the addition, that no person should be placed on the pension roll, if his property shall exceed five hundred dollars independently of his debts.

Mr. WILLIAMS did not wish his amendment to be encumbered with any other proposition. He wished to obtain the sense of the House on the simple and distinct question which he had submitted.

Mr. CARSON objected to Mr. SPEIGHT's motion, that it had been tried and rejected yesterday--that it was useless to offer it again, and he wished to see Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment tried by itself.

On submitting this amendment, Mr. S. said that he rose for the purpose of offering an amendment to the instructions of his colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] He had no disposition to enter into the general discussion of the question before the House; for he was well aware of the situation in which any gentleman was placed who might venture to express his opinion in opposition to a pension bill, however partial it might be in its operation. It would seem, from the disposition manifested by some gentlemen who have participated in the debate, that all those who venture to express objections to this bill are to be regarded as unfeeling and ungrateful towards those who fought for the liberty of the country. He would inform gentlemen he felt as much regard for the welfare of them as any man. But he was opposed to this bill, because it made an invidious distinction; it contemplated provisions only for those who belonged to the regular line; and it was known that the Northern States were the theatre of war with the British, while, in the South, a partisan warfare was carried on, which eventuated in promoting the cause of liberty as much as that in the North. By the passage of this bill, no provision would be made for the troops in the South of the gallant Marion, Sumpter, and Caswell; and, in his opinion, they were equally entitled to the fostering hand of the Government as the regulars. He appealed to the magnanimity and the gratitude of the House, to say if the militia were to be passed by unnoticed. He knew many of them who were old and bowed down by infirmities, and their situation called on this House for aid as much as any portion of the revolutionary patriots. By this bill you make provision for those of the regular line; and if they, as I have no doubt was the fact with many of them, who never saw an enemy and never fired a gun, are to be provided for, while the poor militiamen, who left their homes, had their wives and children butchered, their houses burnt, and every thing destroyed, are to be unnoticed, he was opposed to the bill and all such partial legislation.

The amendment he had proposed fixed the maximum of property at five hundred dollars. In his opinion, that was high enough; and any who was worth that amount of property, after his debts were deducted, was able, without the aid of the Government, to support himself. Though, in conclusion, he would say, he could not so much as say what might be the sum fixed on, he hoped the bill would be committed with the instructions to extend the pension law to the militia.

The debate now assumed a general and comprehensive scope.

Mr. WILDE addressed the House at large, in support of Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment, and in support of the claims of the militia.

Mr. LECOMPTE spoke earnestly in favor of the bill, and the principle of providing liberally for the remnants of the revolutionary army.

Mr. CROCKETT, of Tennessee, said, he felt himself called on to submit a few remarks on the bill under consideration. Sir, [said Mr. C.] I voted against the bill yesterday, which is called an explanatory law of the act of 1818, for the relief of the old revolutionary soldiers. Sir, I consider the provisions of the bill, as it is amended, a partial one, and such a one as I cannot nor will not support. I have always been the firm friend of the old soldiers, and hope ever to remain their friend while I am entitled to raise my voice in this House.

Sir, what are the provisions of the bill? You give any and every man a pension, who has no more than one thousand dollars, exclusive of his household furniture, house, and land. Sir, in my country, we think a man pretty well off who owns that sum after paying all his debts, and owning such property as is described. Sir, I do not consider that a man in such a situation ought to be entitled to the bounty of his Government. Sir, in my country, for the sum of one thousand dollars, a man can purchase two good negro men and one hundred acres of the best land in the country. That, sir, would support a man, without calling on the Government for a pension. I came here [said Mr. C.] to do justice to every man, and under all circumstances; and, if I cannot do this, I will not vote for a partial law like this.

Sir, this bill provides for none but those of the continental line, and excludes all the volunteers and militia who fought in the old war, no matter how meritorious they were. Sir, some of those very men, who fought bravely, and who are tottering through life, almost ready to drop into the grave, have been knocking at the door of Congress for years; and what are we doing, sir? Passing a law to exclude them, and to provide for men that do not need the bounty of the Government. Sir, tack them all together, and I will go as far for them as any gentleman in Congress. What was said by the gentleman from New York? [Mr. TAYLOR.] He has drawn the distinction between the regulars and the militia and volunteers, and has decided in favor of the regulars receiving the bounty of the Government, to the exclusion of the others. Sir, I must beg leave to differ in opinion with that gentleman. If I were to draw a distinction, I would give the preference to the militiaman and the volunteer. The regular sold himself to the Government for a bounty of land and money, which he received long since; and the others went and fought for the love of their country; they left their homes and their wives and children, and fought bravely through the war, and received the little pittance of common wages. Sir, is it just, is it honest, to exclude those men? No, sir; I am bound to decide entirely in their favor, if we give any a preference. But, sir, it is my wish to provide for all. I hear gentlemen say that we will bankrupt the nation. Well, sir, let it be so—I go for all or none. I see millions after millions of money voted away—for what, sir? For the petty little object of supporting your fortifications, breakwaters, or light-houses.

Sir, in my district I know some of those deserving old men, who cannot long trouble this Government with their voices, asking aid, in their old age, to make them feel comfortable. A few days more, and they bid adieu to this world. I do insist that they never ought to be forgotten or neglected, while there is one of them to claim our gratitude. They have achieved the glory and honor of our country by their bravery. The privileges which we are now enjoying on this floor, were purchased by their toil and blood. Sir, let me tell gentlemen that I had the honor, in our last struggle, to shoulder my gun, and march in to the field. There I discovered who fought bravest, the regulars or the volunteers and militia. Sir, when the regular troops were living bountifully, the militia were in a state of starvation. I have witnessed this, and, therefore, I am enabled to judge from that circumstance how they fared in the first war. Sir, there are but few of those poor old veterans in my section of country, though I imagine it is very different in the North. I have been informed, and believe it, that they never die in the Eastern States. Sir, from what I can learn, I should expect that they live always there.

I discover that some gentlemen wish to get the funds of this Government distributed, and they care not for what. Sir, I came here to do justice; and I will do justice, or I will do nothing. In my district, I know one case, where a poor old revolutionary soldier, who served as a volunteer for some time, then enlisted as a sailor, and served three years on the ocean, who is unprovided for. Sir, it is lamentable to view his situation, and hear him tell of his sufferings. It is out of his power, at this time, to find any of his old brother sailors who served with him. Sir, his situation is this: one good neighbor has supported the poor old man, and another his old lady, and maintain them just as an act of charity. I presented the poor old man's claim to this House, and what is the result? He is rejected, and for the reason that he cannot obtain proof, only by his own oath. Sir, I do not believe he would make a misrepresentation for any consideration. This is one case; and I have no doubt but there are many other such cases. For God's sake, if you do extend charity to one class, do so to all. I voted against the old officers' bill, last session, because you would not attach the soldiers to them, who fought with them side by side. Now, sir, if you cut off the volunteers and militia, I will vote against this bill. I will not go for them piecemeal; I take all or none, as I have before stated. To draw a distinction between men who have performed the same services, is what I never will agree to do. If you do not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, and attach the militia and volunteers, as proposed by Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, I will enter my protest against the bill, and believe that I have acted honestly. Sir, I will detain the House no longer.

Mr. CHILTON took the same side, and strenuously advocated the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. RICHARDSON, remarking that this was one of the days set apart for private bills, thought it right to make an effort to prevent the day being consumed by this debate; and he therefore moved the previous question—but the motion was lost.

Mr. CARSON spoke against the recommitment of the bill, and in favor of its passage in its present shape.

Mr. WILLIAMS had refrained from going into any reasons when he offered the amendment, hoping it would be decided without debate, as every man's mind was doubtless made up on the question; but as he had been disappointed in this hope, he now proceeded to submit at large his reasons in favor of his amendment.

Mr. WAYNE followed on the same side, and addressed the House at considerable length, in support of the claims of the militia of the revolution to equal favor, at least, at the hands of the Government.

Mr. HALL handed to the Chair the following extract from a letter which he had received from the chief of the Pension Office, which he desired to be read for the information of the House.

"It appears that the following appropriations have been made for paying pensioners under the act of March 18, 1818. The law of the 20th April, 1828, appropriated	$ 300,000

"The precise number of applications cannot be ascertained, as a correct account of them was not kept at the commencement of the operation of the law; but the amount is known to exceed thirty-one thousand.

"The number of men in the continental army, at the close of the revolutionary war, was thirteen thousand four hundred and seventy-six. The army was larger in 1776 than at any other period of the war: it contained forty-six thousand eight hundred and ninety-one men."

"MARCH 19, 1830.

"The amount of appropriations up to this time, including the appropriation of this session, if rightly added, is sixteen millions five hundred and fifty-eight thousand three hundred and twenty-four dollars and twenty-nine cents."

The question being put on Mr. SPEIGHT'S motion, it was negatived without a decision.

The amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS was then also decided in the negative by the following vote: yeas, 74—nays, 107.

Mr. POLK then spoke some time against the passage of the bill. When he concluded,

Mr. DODDRIDGE called for the previous question, which was seconded, 84 to 74; and the main question was ordered, the effect of which was to set aside all amendments and intermediate motions. So that

The question was put on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

The resolution offered by Mr. SWIFT, and the amendment to the same offered by Mr. DRAYTON, were again taken up for consideration. The question being on referring both to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HUNT was opposed to referring this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee had already been discharged from the consideration of it, and it would be useless to refer it to them again. He considered the fortifications to which the resolution pointed as necessary to be erected on the line mentioned, although he admitted, with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] that fortifications were useless in woods, or in a champain country, where the contending parties met on equal terms. But he said in this case circumstances were different. Lake Champlain extends from Lower Canada one hundred miles and upwards into our country, and a few miles north of the boundary line. The British have erected fortifications. The object of the resolution was to have an examination made for a suitable place south of the line to build a fortification. He was informed that it could be done for a little expense, and he would undertake to say that there was no place on our northern or southern boundaries more important either for offensive or defensive operations, than this place on our northern boundary line. Mr. H. referred to the expenses which were incurred during the late war for defending the frontier, where a large army was constantly required. Had a fortification been built here, these expenses would not have been necessary, and the army might have been employed to advantage in some other part of the country. The Legislature of Vermont deemed some security as necessary here; and as the expense will be but trifling, he hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. HOFFMAN thought that in reference to this subject we were acting too early, and that, if even that were not the case, it would require a joint resolution of both Houses to effect this object. How can we proceed a step in this inquiry [said Mr. H.] until the boundary line between Canada and the United States is determined? The boundary line may be varied by the decision at least ten miles; and while such is the case, he thought a survey would be useless. He hoped the resolution would be laid on the table; and, unless he heard something from gentlemen to alter the opinions he entertained, he should make a motion to that effect. We have already [he said] expended much for a similar project, and it is uncertain whether the object of it has been useless or not.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, said, that, about the year 1816, subsequent to the termination of the last war, Government directed a fortification to be erected on Lake Champlain, at Rouse's Point: propositions were made to effect this at an expense of probably half a million of dollars. After having incurred this expense, Mr. Ellicot, one of the professors at West Point, was directed to ascertain the latitude of Rouse's Point, and it turned out that the fortification was about to be built one mile north of the line, whereby the whole amount expended was lost, and the materials of the building, if exposed to sale, would be worth little or nothing. Mr. S. said he had a higher objection to the proposition. He supposed that they on the other side of the line required fortifications, and not we. The idea that the weaker power should attack us, and that we require a fortification for our defence, he thought preposterous. The State of Vermont was alone and unaided, capable of defending herself; if not, New York could pour forth an overwhelming force.

Mr. S. said, he had to reproach himself for having remained in the House silent, while very large appropriation bills had been passed for erecting fortifications. He asked why we should erect fortifications which will require fifty thousand men to defend them. He believed that this country would never be invaded; and believing this, he was not in favor of studding it with fortifications. He reproached himself for permitting such appropriation bills to pass, without entering his protest against them.

We boast of our navy, [said Mr. S.] and it is our policy to have a navy. We can protect our coasts by our navy, without squandering the resources of the country in erecting fortifications. He condemned such a policy, and he would not vote away a cent to advance it. He apprehended that the secret of applying for money to erect fortifications, was not so much the necessity for them, as the benefit to be derived from the expenditure of the money in the part of the country where they are to be built. Mr. S. said he did not impute any such motives to the gentleman from Vermont, who offered the resolution; but let such projects come from any quarter, he would not give his assent to what he believed a lavish and useless expenditure, delaying the extinguishment of the national debt. He said he was not prepared, nor did he intend, to debate the policy of the course which had been pursued; but, if a fit occasion presented itself, he would discuss, and he hoped to be able to show, the absurdity of the course which had been pursued of building fortifications, merely to go to decay and to become dilapidated.

Mr. FINCH said, if his colleague had been acquainted with the exigencies of the late war, as he was, he would have been convinced of the necessity of having fortifications on the northern frontier. During that war, not a month passed that the towns of that part of the country were not stripped of their inhabitants. Government was in consequence compelled to expend four times the amount of money in defending the country on the borders of Lake Champlain that would be required for building a fortification. The naval defence was not sufficient. The enemy came up our rivers, and burned or devastated our towns. The expense of the fortification would not be great, as the materials of the former fortification still remain at our disposal. The War Department is of opinion that the measure is necessary; they have recommended it, and it is at their suggestion the resolution has been offered. Former experience has taught us the necessity of having some defensive position on the frontier, in case a like attack should ever be made against us. He hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. DRAYTON opposed the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, as they had been discharged from the consideration of the subject already. He wished that no further proceedings should take place with respect to this resolution. It appears that an appropriation will be required for making the surveys if the resolution offered by the gentleman from Vermont be adopted. At this time [Mr. D. said] it would be impossible to make the desired surveys, as the land there is covered with water. And it would be impossible to comply with that part of the resolution requiring a suitable site to be selected for building a fortification, until the boundary line is settled. He had no doubt, however, that the War Department would be enabled to make satisfactory returns by the next session of Congress. Mr. D. did not agree with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER] that the country bordering on Lake Champlain did not require fortifications for its defence in time of war; for, in the event of another war, as in the last, the enemy could march into the very bowels of the country. In the opinion of the Government they are required; and when the boundary line shall have been settled, then the projects of gentlemen can be more easily carried into effect. [Mr. D. concluded, but the debate was discontinued, as the hour allotted for considering resolutions had elapsed.]

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

Mr. BURGESS moved to take up the bill for the relief of the revolutionary pensioners, to exempt them from arrest on civil action, &c. it being the special order of the day. The motion was carried in the affirmative.

MARCH 23, 1830.]

Case of Judge Peck.—Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

[H. of R.]

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That no person who was, during any part of the revolutionary war, engaged in either the land or naval service of the United States, and who has already, or may hereafter receive, in consideration of such service, pecuniary aid from his country, by pension or otherwise, in any way other than his pay, subsistence, clothing, and bounty, shall at any time hereafter, be liable to be arrested, holden to bail, or imprisoned, on civil process issued under any authority of the United States, for or on account of any demands the consideration of which originated before such aid was granted to such persons.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever any person, having been in service and receiving aid so as aforesaid, shall have been arrested, holden to bail, or imprisoned for any demand, such as aforesaid, under process issued from any authority other than that of the United States, and the creditor or creditors at whose suit such process shall have issued, shall, while the same is pending, or after final judgment thereon, receive of such person, in consideration thereof, or any release therefrom, any sum or sums of money arising from any such aid granted to him, so as aforesaid, or any promise to pay therefrom, or any order or draft to receive the sum at any future time, such creditor shall forfeit and pay twice the amount thereof, one moiety to the use of such person, and the other to whomsoever shall sue for and recover the same; and such suit and recovery may be had before any tribunal of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no creditor of any such person receiving aid, so as aforesaid, shall, by letter of attorney, order, draft, or otherwise, from him, be entitled to receive any dividend or payment due to such person at any office or place where, by law, the same may be payable to him; and no person whoever, as agent or attorney, shall at any time receive any such payment, unless he first makes oath that he had no interest therein, and that he will pay over the amount thereof to the person to whom the same was so as aforesaid granted.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR rose, and addressed the House at considerable length in opposition to the bill—deeming its provisions objectionable in principle, particularly the retroactive portion of them.

Mr. BURGESS was proceeding to reply; when

Mr. BARBOUR said, if the second section were expunged, it would remove his objections to the bill.

Mr. BURGESS suggested that this object would be attained by striking out the word "consideration," and to the end of the first section.

Mr. HOFFMAN, of New York, opposed the bill as impolitic and unjust, and of no benefit to the individuals which it proposed to benefit.

Mr. RAMSEY, of Pennsylvania, also contended that it would be prejudicial to the interest of the persons themselves, as they would not be able to hold any office in the collection of revenue, &c., as they could not be sued for delinquency—and that it would deprive them of credit, &c.

Mr. GOODENOW, after some remarks in support of the bill, moved to amend it by inserting after the word "bounty" in the first section, the words "and who shall continue to receive such aid;" which was agreed to.

Mr. BURGESS then rose, and replied at large to the objections which had been urged to the bill, and defended its justice, expediency, and humanity.

Mr. DRAYTON, considering the closing part of the second section as having an ex post facto operation, moved to strike out all after the word "time," and inserting other words, which he sent to the Chair.

The question was then put on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative by the casting vote of the SPEAKER—the vote being 60 for and 60 against it.

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and took up the bill to lay out and establish a national road from Buffalo, in New York, by Washington city, to New Orleans.

Mr. HEMPHILL rose, and entered into a general defence of the proposed measure, maintaining its constitutionality—being a work emphatically national—its high importance to the Union, &c. He had not concluded his remarks, when he gave way for a motion for the committee to rise.

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1830.

CASE OF JUDGE PECK.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of Luke E. Lawless, of Missouri, complaining of the conduct of James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, made a report thereon, concluding with the opinion that the said judge ought to be impeached.

Mr. BUCHANAN, in presenting the above report, stated that the committee had deemed it fairest towards the party accused, not to report to the House their reasons at length for arriving at the conclusion that he ought to be impeached. In this respect, they thought it advisable to follow the precedent which had been established in the case of the impeachment of Judge Chase. Mr. B. moved to print the report and documents.

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the motion to print, by adding the words, "And also the memorial of Luke E. Lawless, and the address of the judge to the committee."

Mr. HAYNES moved to suspend the rule of the House which prohibits debate on motions to print, so far as concerns the subject under consideration. —Negatived.

The amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY was rejected, and the report and documents were ordered to be printed.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Military Pensions, and by order of that committee, moved that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Military Pensions, on the 8th of January last, to extend the pension laws of the United States, so as to include within its provisions every soldier who aided in establishing our liberties, and who is unable to maintain himself in comfort; and that the said resolution be made the special order of the day for Monday next, the 29th instant.

Mr. B. said, gentlemen who were in favor of the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, on Friday last, to provide for the militia, would, by this resolution, be presented with an opportunity of effecting their wishes; and, on the motion which he made, he asked the yeas and nays. They were ordered accordingly, and were as follows:

For the motion; 129,—Against it; 47.

Mr. SWIFT moved a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday, by which the resolution relative to fortifications on Lake Champlain, offered by him on the 18th instant, was referred to the Secretary of War—the question having been misapprehended at the time it was put—many members supposing it was on his original resolution, whereas it was on the amendment.

The motion was agreed to; but the expiration of the hour arrested further proceedings to-day.

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill "for making a road from Buffalo, through Washington city, to New Orleans."

Mr. HEMPHILL concluded his remarks in support of the bill. They were to the following effect:

Mr. H. began by saying that he would, at this early stage, endeavor to explain the reasons why the bill before the committee ought to pass into a law. It embraces, [said Mr. H.] as I conceive, a subject of the highest interest. The usefulness which the contemplated road will beto the country, is of itself exceedingly important; and besides, this legislative enactment will hold out full assurance that national improvements are intended to be prosecuted by the General Government. In this light, the magnitude of the question, now ready for discussion, cannot be overrated.

In the commencement, I will be permitted to remark, that it is not the design of the friends of national improvements to interfere with the annual extinguishment of the public debt, as now provided for by law. The regular operation of existing laws will soon clear the nation of debt. The exertions of statesmen towards the accomplishment of this object are no longer required. But as to the momentous question of improving the country, for its own prosperity and glory, it ranks first, and is truly worthy of the best efforts of the nation. It is equally interesting to the present age and to posterity; and nothing less than complete success will ever terminate its repeated debates on this floor. I will dwell no longer at present in general remarks.

Some gentlemen entertain the opinion that these great objects ought to be accomplished by the several States. I never could accord with this opinion. The States are to take care of their own local interests within their own limits; it is not their duty to legislate with a view to national purposes. Neither could they, without the consent of Congress, confederate to make extensive roads, passing through many States, for great and national purposes. In this immense country, it is impossible to foresee all the channels through which our inland commerce may take its direction. No exact plan can be devised; it would be rash to designate all the places where roads, canals, and bridges should be made fifteen or twenty years hence. It will be judicious to select a few objects at a time, and to progress with the rising condition of the country. Congress will always be the best capable of selecting the grand and leading objects which will accommodate themselves to the good of the Union at large; and for these purposes, Congress, according to my conception of the case, ought to retain in her own hands her own means. This brings me to the consideration of an opinion which has gained some standing, and has even attracted the attention of the President; I mean the propriety of distributing the surplus revenue among the several States. The President has expressed his doubts in relation to its constitutionality; and I think that, on a further consideration of this subject, he would be enabled to speak more positively as to the constitutional barrier.

I assume it as a principle which, on a fair examination, cannot be shaken, that whenever money is in the treasury, it is immaterial from whence it has arisen; the constitution puts no mark upon it; it may be pledged by previous laws, for constitutional purposes, but in no event can it be withdrawn from the treasury, unless it is to effect some expressed or implied provisions in the constitution. A power in the General Government over internal improvements has never been claimed, except on such objects as Congress may, from time to time, deem national. Lands have been ceded to States for specific objects of national improvements. The bill which was rejected by Mr. Madison in 1817, retained the control over the objects on which the expenditures were to be made in each State.

But if Congress should distribute money generally among the States for internal improvements, it may be expended on local and minor objects, over which Congress themselves have no power. The States, in expending the money, will not look to national objects, but to their own internal concerns, and perhaps to a rivalry with their adjoining neighbors.

Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, in their messages, approved entirely of the expediency of exercising this power by the General Government.

Mr. Monroe has expressed his opinion on the subject in the most satisfactory manner. I beg leave to read this part of the document, called his views on internal improvements. [Here Mr. H. read the following:]

"It cannot be doubted that improvements for great national purposes, would be better made by the General Government than by the Governments of the several States. Our experience, prior to the adoption of the constitution, demonstrated that, by the exercise by the individual States of most of the powers granted to the United States, a contracted rivalry of interests, and misapplied jealousy of each other, had an important influence on all their measures, to the great injury of the whole. This was particularly exemplified by the regulations which they severally made of their commerce with foreign nations and with each. It was this utter incapacity in the State Governments, proceeding from these and other causes, to act as a nation, and to perform all the duties which the nation owed to itself, under any system which left the General Government dependant on the States, which produced the transfer of these powers to the United States by the establishment of the present constitution.

"The reasoning which was applicable to the grant of any of the powers now vested in Congress, is likewise so; at least to a certain extent, to that in question. It is natural that the States individually, in making improvements, should look to their particular and local interests. The members composing their respective legislatures, represent the people of each State only, and might not feel themselves at liberty to look to objects in these respects beyond that limit.

"If the resources of the Union were to be brought into operation, under the direction of the State assemblies, or in concert with them, it may be apprehended that every measure would become the object of negotiation, of bargain, and barter, much to the disadvantage of the system, as well as discredit to both Governments. But Congress would look to the whole, and make improvements to promote the welfare of the whole. It is the peculiar felicity of the proposed amendment, that, while it will enable the United States to accomplish every national object, the improvements made with that view will eminently promote the welfare of the individual States, who may also add such others as their own particular interest may require."

In addition to this enlightened view of the subject, I may be permitted to submit a few remarks: and the first is, that when the plan of distribution is once adopted, it can never be recalled; it will grow into a species of right: and a majority of the representatives from the several States will never vote to restore the funds to the General Government. A thousand reasons will be assigned to oppose its restoration, whenever the General Government shall stand in need of it. Among others, it would be said (and with great justice) that the faith of the United States had been pledged, and, on this reliance, schemes of internal improvements had been partially executed; and to withdraw the funds, would be to sacrifice the expenditures already made. This oppression would vary in the different States according to the condition of their works—it would create confusions and confusions of interest that would be alarming. The funds which belong to the Union, would be entangled in local and minor undertakings. But while the General Government retains its own resources, she will always be prepared to meet the great and complicated concerns of the nation, whether in peace or in war. She can select the objects of improvements, on such a scale as not only to be able to complete them, but also to be in a state of readiness for any sudden emergency.

This road, leading from the seat of the General Government to Buffalo and to New Orleans, two frontiers which will be imminently exposed in the event of a war, cannot be otherwise than of the highest importance. The badness of the road from hence to Buffalo, during the last war, protracted intelligence, and prevented a quick concentration of troops and of the munitions of war to the parts required. If there had been good roads, the military disasters at the commencement of the war never would have occurred. The badness of the roads swelled the expenses of the country to a prodigious degree. A single cannon transported from the foundries on the seaboard to the frontiers of the lakes, costs about two thousand dollars, and every article necessary in war bore the same wasteful and extravagant proportion. The waste which the necessity of the times, and state of the roads, exposed us to, would more than make the road contemplated in the bill. Our country is large; and the frontiers and exposed points being at great distances from each other, render the necessity of good roads (in a time of war) all essential. The military power of a nation, in all ages, consists not more in a numerous population and great resources, than its capacity to concentrate its forces with rapidity to the exposed points on the frontier liable to be assailed. Good communications increase the military arm in a due proportion to the population and resources of a nation or country. On a single day, sooner or later in the arrival of troops or intelligence, may altogether depend the fate of the most important places in the country.

This road to Buffalo presents advantages peculiarly national in their character. It opens a country abounding in iron, fuel, and water power; and, in the event of our foundries and armories on the seaboard being destroyed by an enemy, it would afford the means of establishing others in the interior, secure from attack, where cannon, shot, small arms, &c. might be manufactured, which, by means of this road, and other means of transportation, could be taken to any point wherever the nation should require. It would also open to the seaboard, as well as to the lakes, an extensive and fertile country, increasing in population and in the production of provisions of every description, and which could be made available at either extremity of the road.

The proposed road would derive additional importance, in a military view, from the character of the population of the country through which it will pass. In the mountain regions, it is said that there is scarcely an individual who is not well acquainted with firearms, and expert in horsemanship; the whole population in the mountain regions (as well as in the plain country) are distinguished for their physical energies, which will always render them among the best materials for military purposes. In time of peace, cannon and munitions of war might be conveyed by sea and the New York canal to the frontiers on the lakes. But, in time of war, the maritime power of the enemy would render this communication too uncertain, and in the winter time the canal would be frozen. [Here Mr. HEMPHILL read the report of Doctor Howard, one of the United States' engineers.]

"The importance of such a road as that now proposed, in a military point of view, is so strongly marked, that it will not be necessary to dwell on them in detail, but merely to point them out. It will afford a ready communication to the northern frontier, from the central part of Pennsylvania, from Maryland, and from the eastern part of the State of Virginia, giving facilities for the transportation not only of men, but also of many of the supplies and munitions of war, which are the productions of these three States. During the last war, the route by the Painted Post was found so necessary for this purpose, that it was extensively used; and, notwithstanding the badness of the roads, supplies of all kinds were carried on it, at an expense which it is satisfactorily estimated would have been sufficient (in a single campaign) to have defrayed the cost of the work.

"In the present situation of things, the citizens of the western part of New York are almost as effectually separated from their neighbors of Pennsylvania, as if an impassable barrier were interposed between them."

The highway proposed in the bill will open lucrative communications between these interesting sections of our country. The location of the road from Washington to Buffalo, is left to the discretion of the commissioners, as the committee could not, satisfactorily to themselves, designate the route.

The committee have deemed it sufficient to have the road located, graduated, and bridged, and to form the bed of the road, as an earthen turnpike, except in such cases where it will be indispensable to use gravel. On examination of the estimates of the engineers for making turnpike roads on the several routes from Washington to New Orleans, they state so much for location, so much for graduation and bridges, and so much for turnpiking with stone. The committee, by deducting the latter, and taking the best pains they could upon the subject, came to the conclusion that fifteen hundred dollars per mile would make an excellent common road, graduated at an elevation of three degrees in the mile.

From this city to Buffalo, a considerable distance is turnpiked; and, whenever that is the case, it is not to be affected by this bill. The whole road to be made will be, as near as the committee could judge, about fifteen hundred miles, which will cost two million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be drawn in instalments of not more in one year than about five hundred thousand dollars; which sum the country will scarcely feel, and it will be distributed along the whole line among architects, the owners of the adjacent lands for materials, and to the poor and industrious laborers.

The great national advantages of a road from the seat of Government to New Orleans, will scarcely, I should suppose, be denied by any one. Soon after the acquisition of Louisiana, Mr. Jefferson, as I have understood, had a reconnaissance of a road to New Orleans taken at his private expense. It has been deemed of such magnitude by the General Government, that three general routes have been surveyed, under the act of 30th April, 1824; many of the reasons assigned in favor of the Buffalo part of the road will equally apply to this part. Its importance in time of war cannot be overrated; the difficulty of transporting men and arms to this exposed point (during the last war) is well known to us all. I will not descend to particulars: I appeal to the recollection of this honorable committee.

The routes surveyed are an eastern, a middle, and a western route. The committee, after a careful examination of the report of the engineers of 8th April, 1826, selected the western route. The Committee on Roads and Canals, at the last session of Congress, did the same; and I am persuaded the Committee of the Whole House will be of opinion that it is, upon the whole, the most eligible route—each have their advantages and disadvantages. The report says, "that the eastern and middle routes will accommodate directly more States than the western; but, by anticipating the increase of the population on the western route, that the three, in this respect, ought to be placed on the same footing. In comparing the western route with the eastern route, we find that on the eastern route the soil is inferior, the bridges and causeways will be greater, the advantages to internal commerce will be less, and that this route would not be so useful in war; that the carrying of the mail and the expenses of travelling would be greater, and, on the whole, it will be more costly. Its advantages over the western route are, that the graduation will be less, that it would, in a greater degree, facilitate correspondence between our inland importing and exporting marts, and also diffuse political information between the General Government and the capitals of the South, as this route would pass through many of them. In comparing the western with the middle route, we find the materials for a road about the same. The soil on the western route is the best; the causeways will be less, and the graduation greater. The bridges on the western route will be in length only three miles and nine hundred and fifty-three yards. On the middle route, the length of the bridges will be six miles and one thousand two hundred and thirty-nine yards. The distance of the middle route is eleven hundred and forty miles. On one course of the western route, the distance is exactly the same; but on Snicker's Gap route, it is eleven hundred and sixty-three miles. The expense of labor is rather less on the western route. For carrying the mail, the report gives preference to the middle route, but at the same time remarks, that, as to time, it does not suffice that it should be travelled over in the shortest time, and at the least possible expense; but it must also accommodate laterally to its direction the greatest extent possible of territory. In this point of view, it is said, if the western route is not as central as the others, in relation to the States it traverses, it has the advantage of being more central in relation to the States taken together, and comprehended between the Atlantic on the east, and the Ohio and the Mississippi on the west.

But, in relation to such a road as this will be, extending from the seat of Government to two exposed and extreme frontiers of the country, and which is calculated to remain a great highway for ages, a little difference in expense or distance ought not to be viewed as of much importance.

There are considerations which give a decided preference to the western route. The first is its superior advantages in time of war. The Southern States will have their own borders to defend, and this they will be always capable of doing. They are contiguous to each other, a condensed population, and nearer to the seat of Government, and to the military and naval establishments. They will seldom, if ever, be called across the mountains. The States on the Gulf of Mexico, being in the vicinity of the West Indies, will be exposed to imminent danger; and their own forces being inconsiderable, they must look for assistance from remote inland States. Tennessee and Kentucky, having no frontiers to defend, and being more interested than the South in the regions of the gulf, would be their natural allies, and always ready to aid the States of Louisiana and Alabama, and to defend the naval establishments at Pensacola. This road, in case of an emergency, would afford to the Western States the most signal advantages. They could then march their troops to the field of battle. The western route will connect different sections of the country, which are separated by natural obstacles. This is one of the great advantages of internal improvements. It will form a communication between the West and the Atlantic Ocean, and augment internal trade; the people of the West could bring their produce to it and along it, in either direction, to the most convenient avenue to a market.

There is another consideration; it is miraculous to see, as we now do, the rising country in the West—the imagination of no man could have foreseen it. The enterprise of the West has greatly enlarged the importance and power of the nation; and, as the Western States have no lands to form a public fund, it cannot be expected that they will make many leading roads for a long time, by a direct taxation on the people: the nett proceeds from the sale of the public lands will always be inadequate for the roads which their rapidly increasing population will require. This road would highly benefit a portion of the West; but, if it should run to the east of the mountains, the people of the West would reap no advantage from it.

I will close this part of the subject, by reading an extract from the report of the Postmaster General, in 1824. It is as follows:

"That the route on which the mail is carried from the seat of Government to New Orleans, is estimated at one thousand three hundred and eighty miles, and requires a travel of twenty-four days in the winter and spring seasons of the year. The mail on this route is sometimes entirely obstructed by high waters; and, when this is not the case, it is frequently much injured by the mail horses swimming creeks and through swamps, by which newspapers are frequently destroyed, and letters obliterated."

In this report, it is further remarked that "the route by the way of Warrenton, Abington, and Knoxville, affords great facilities for the construction of a mail road. Through Virginia and Tennessee, the materials are abundant for the formation of a turnpike; and through the States of Alabama and Mississippi, it is believed, from information which has been obtained, that in no part of the Union can an artificial road of the same length be constructed at less expense; on this part of the route the face of the country is level, and the soil well adapted for the formation of a solid road. If a substantial road were made in this direction to New Orleans, the mail could be transported to that place, from this city, in eleven days; if the roads were to pass through the capitals of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, it could be conveyed in less than twelve days. The department now pays at the rate of fifty-six dollars and seventy-six cents a mile for the transportation of the mail, three times in each week, to New Orleans, when, on a good turnpike road, it could be conveyed in a stage, as often, and in less than half the time, at the same expense, with the utmost security, and with a considerable increase of the receipts of the department."

The committee have introduced this bill, without any reference to the consent of the States, deeming it to be entirely immaterial. Mr. Madison, in his rejection of the bill, to set apart, &c. says, "That if the power is not vested in Congress, the assent of the States cannot confer it." In the first session of the fifteenth Congress, this House, by a vote of ninety to seventy-five, asserted the power to make post roads, military roads, and other roads, without the consent of the States. By the act of the 30th April, 1802, by which Ohio was admitted into the Union, certain conditions were annexed, for the free acceptance or rejection of the convention, among which was the application of a part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the State to the laying out and making of public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same—such roads to be laid out, under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which such roads shall pass. In compliance with this act, the law of the 29th March, 1806, for the construction of the Cumberland road, requested the President to obtain the consent of the States through which the road was to pass. At this early period, it does not appear that the subject had been much reflected on. Mr. Monroe's views, presented to Congress on the 4th of May, 1822, contain this passage—"The States, individually, cannot transfer the power to the United States, nor can the United States receive it. The constitution forms an equal, and the sole relation, between the General Government and the several States, and it recognises no changes in it which should not in like manner apply to all." In addition, I will read an extract from the report of the Committee on Roads and Canals, in the first session of the eighteenth Congress. [Here Mr. HEMPHILL read the following:]

"The General Government cannot acquire exclusive jurisdiction, except over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same may be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings. The States can, in no other instance, give jurisdiction to the United States. The General Government derives its whole power from the constitution, and it can neither be increased nor diminished, in the slightest particular, by any other means than by an amendment of the constitution.

"The General Government and the States are to act in their own proper spheres on the powers they respectively possess; they cannot exchange power, or, by any consent or combination of power, give or take jurisdiction from each other."

Congress became so well convinced of the inutility of obtaining the consent of the States, that, by the act of the 3d March, 1825, for the continuation of the Cumberland road to Zanesville, and to lay out a road from thence, by the seats of the Governments of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to the seat of Government in the State of Missouri, they omitted the clause entirely. Indeed, every one, on the slightest reflection, will see that power cannot be acquired in this way, and to exercise it in this modified form might lead to delays and inconveniences: some States may assent and others decline, and the consent may be given on conditions concerning which disputes might afterwards arise.

I am fully convinced that, where either Government possesses jurisdiction, it had better act on its own authority: where there is a concurrent jurisdiction, there can never be a necessity for both to act; for, if one acts, both can enjoy the benefit of it. I am speaking of internal improvements; in such cases there can be no danger of any conflict, for it is unnatural to suppose that one would desire to expend money on an object which the other had commenced, and was willing to accomplish of its own accord. I will here be allowed, Mr. Chairman, to make a few general observations on the subject of internal improvements; and I will begin with calling to the recollection of the committee extracts from the messages of several of the Presidents.

Mr. Jefferson, in anticipation of a surplus revenue, made suggestions as to its application. He asked, "Shall it lay unproductive in the vaults? Shall the revenue be reduced? or shall it not rather be appropriated to the improvement of roads and canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union, under the powers which Congress may already possess, or by such amendments of the constitution as may be approved of by the States? While uncertain of the course of things, the time may be advantageously employed in obtaining the powers necessary for a system of improvements, should that be thought best."

Mr. Madison, in his message of 1815, refers to this subject, and says, that, "among the means of advancing the public interests, the occasion is a proper one for recalling the attention of Congress to the great importance of establishing, throughout our country, the roads and canals which can best be executed under the national authority. No objects within the circle of political economy so richly repay the expenses bestowed on them; there are none the utility of which is more universally ascertained and acknowledged; none that do more honor to the Governments, whose wise and enlarged patriotism duly appreciate them; nor is there any country which presents a field where nature invites more the art of man, to complete her own work, for his accommodation and benefit. These considerations are strengthened, moreover, by the political effects of these facilities for intercommunication, in bringing and binding more closely together the various parts of an extended confederacy. Whilst the States, individually, and with a laudable enterprise and emulation, avail themselves of their local advantages by new roads, by navigable canals, and by improving the streams susceptible of navigation, the General Government is the more urged to similar undertakings, requiring a national jurisdiction and national means, by the prospect of thus systematically completing so inestimable a work; and it is a happy reflection, that any defect of the constitutional authority can be supplied in a mode which the constitution itself has providently pointed out." Again, in his message of the 3d March, 1817, he says, "I am not unaware of the great importance of roads and canals, and the improved navigation of water streams, and that a power in the National Legislature to provide for them might be exercised with signal advantage to the general prosperity."

Mr. Monroe, in his message of 1817, observed, that, "When we consider the vast extent of territory within the United States, the great amount and value of its productions, the connexion of its parts, and other circumstances on which their prosperity and happiness depend, we cannot fail to entertain a high sense of the advantages to be derived from the facility which may be afforded in the intercourse between them, by means of good roads and canals. Never did a country of such vast extent offer equal inducements to improvements of this kind, nor ever were consequences of such magnitude involved in them," &c.

In relation to the preservation of the Union, the subject presents itself in the strongest possible light. The character of the face of the country, the variety of soils and climates, necessarily give powerful impulses to sectional interests and feelings; and, in the absence of great and national improvements, these different interests will be entirely regulated by the mountains, waters, soil, and climate; and the stronger these interests grow in their natural channels, unconnected and independent of each other, the more will the affections for the General Government diminish.

A people, speaking one common language, and being in substance the same people, can have no inducements to separate, while their interests can be interchanged to the advantage of the whole. But this highly interesting, political, and commercial state of society can only be attained and secured by internal improvements of a national character. There is no other choice. All the wisdom and experience of man can contrive nothing else. It is to internal improvements, and to those only, that the people are to look for these high and permanent blessings.

A thorough and judicious execution of internal improvements would enliven the whole country. The advantages of such public works are so universally acknowledged, that it would be time misspent to go into any reasoning on the subject. The results have been the same in all ages and nations. It is enough to say that it will promote the landed interest to its highest tide of prosperity, and that it will always be the leading interest of this country. Where there is no carrying trade to a great extent, commerce, cannot lead; it must follow the prosperity of the land: and whenever that flourishes, commerce, manufactures, and the various vocations of society, will participate in the general good. Congress can do no act which will so effectually remove the necessity of a high tariff. The raw materials will be more abundant, and consequently cheaper. They can be transported to the manufactory, and the manufactured articles from thence to the market places, at a less expense. No policy ever was, or ever can be, presented to the national councils, which would be more purely American. It benefits the whole, and oppresses none.

There is no country more susceptible of improvements than our own. It comprehends so many degrees of latitude on the ocean, and also of longitude in the interior, abounding with mountains, lakes, and rivers, and embracing almost every climate and variety of soil. I will not fatigue the committee by any enumeration of the capacities of the country for improvements. I will barely allude to one, which, I think, ought never to be lost sight of—I mean the Atlantic canal, from the extreme North to St. Mary's, and one to connect the waters of the Atlantic with the Gulf of Mexico, and from thence to New Orleans. This once effected, would connect itself with all the landings and valuable streams, from the Mississippi to the extrene North, and by the Erie and Champlain canals with the lakes and the St. Lawrence.

The spirit of improvement has advanced in this country, and is still advancing. In the local and limited sphere of most of the States, the opinion in favor of this policy has gained the ascendancy.

It is in the General Government, which alone can plan and execute for the welfare of the whole, where the greatest gloom exists; it is here, where old-fashioned prejudices and impediments of every description seem to combine.

The history of public undertakings discloses the fact, that, although in the beginning, discouragements and frowns always await them, still, in the end, thanks can never be too bountifully bestowed.

The first important turnpike road made in America was opposed with the most active violence.

The State of New York had to wage a warfare against the prejudices of the times. Their grand projects were believed, by many, to be romantic, impracticable, and far beyond the resources of a single State.

The execution of improvements met with similar resistance in England. When a turnpike road was projected from London to the interior of the country, the landlords near the town became alarmed, as they feared that, by bringing the heart of the country so near to the London market, it would cause a fall in their rents; but, to their surprise, they discovered that rents rose along the whole distance of the road. Still, it is a remarkable fact, that England, as a nation so enterprising, and so celebrated for her anxiety to promote her own interest, should not have prosecuted internal improvement for ages after her means were ample. She had read of the water communications in China; she was familiar with the fame of the Romans, in the construction of their stupendous aqueducts, and their costly and magnificent roads; she had witnessed extensive improvements on the Continent, and was acquainted with the utility of the canals in Holland—still, she was not awakened until a hundred years after the existence of the canal of the two seas in France, when an enterprising individual, in a private undertaking, roused the nation, and infused among the people a spirit in favor of internal improvements, which became irresistible, and pervades the kingdom to the present day. Fine roads superseded the common roads. Canals are so numerous, that they approach within fifteen miles of almost every spot in England. Breakwaters are erected at their dangerous harbors. Streams are every where improved, and superbly bridged. They are now engaged in the grand experiment of the railroad system. The Darlington and Stockton railroad shed such light on the subject, that it called into action the enterprise of the large cities of Manchester and Liverpool. A railroad, with four tracks, is now nearly completed between these two towns; and, to avoid the inconvenience of a long train of coal wagons in the streets, a tunnel is made under the large city of Liverpool. It would be difficult for any nation to surpass English enterprise. To accommodate the lower part of London, on both sides of the river, a tunnel (under the Thames) is now nearly executed.

I fear I may be rather tedious; examples, however, are sometimes advantageous, and the theme itself is not barren of agreeable interest. Reflections on this very subject afforded consolation to the late Emperor of France, when a prisoner on the rock of St. Helena. This extraordinary man, among his other feats, was, in the cause of internal improvements, the mighty champion of the age. In speaking of the treatment of the allied powers towards him, he said: "At least they cannot take from me, hereafter, the great public works which I have executed, the roads which I have made, and the seas which I have united. They cannot place their feet to improve, where mine have not been before them. Thank God, of these they cannot deprive me."

His public works were, indeed, extensive and splendid. In a period, from 1800 to 1813, in which he had to contend with all the nations of Europe, and was deprived of commerce on the ocean, he executed improvements on the most expanded scale. He made a thorough repair of twenty-five thousand miles of turnpike roads, which had gone to ruin in the preceding years of political anarchy. He projected eighty bridges of large dimensions, forty of which were finished, and the remainder partially executed. He planned thirty distinct canals, seven of which were completed. Among the unfinished, were several very important ones; such as the canal de St. Guentin, to connect the river Somme with the Scheldt; the canal de St. Oucry, to supply the whole city of Paris with water; the canal of the Meuse and the Rhine, to connect the Baltic with the channel; and the canal of the Rhone and the Rhine, to connect Marseilles, on the Mediterranean, with Amsterdam, on the German Ocean. He improved the navigation of fifteen rivers, and reclaimed extensive marshes. At Antwerp and Cherbourg, he constructed great basins for ships of war or commerce; and he also improved extensively eighteen or twenty other ports. He almost re-made the roads in Italy; and the excavations at Pompeii were prosecuted under his auspices, until it exhibited one of the most interesting curiosities in the universe. He compelled the Alps to bow to his genius, which, from the creation, had looked down on the rest of the world. Over the most frightful and precipitous parts of these and the adjacent mountains, he constructed fourteen hundred miles of good turnpike roads. This is a mere outline of the grand works which he executed in the short period of thirteen years.

If the surplus revenue, after the extinguishment of the public debt, does not disappoint our expectations, this country, in the space of twenty years, may be made to rank with any on the globe. We have labor and skill enough—we have no wars, or prospect of wars—we seem invited to the execution of public works, to give to the country that artificial finish, which our interest and political considerations require.

To effect this great end, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Monroe proposed a change in the constitution, to invest Congress with an explicit and complete power. The latter has more especially described the extent of his meaning. It is to give the General Government power to execute a system of internal improvements, and to erect toll gates on national roads, with an authority to punish individuals who shall do any injury to the public works.

Let us examine, for a moment, the practical operation of the system thus proposed by these gentlemen. Will the exercise of the power to make a road produce any bad effects? Private property can be taken for public use, on paying a just compensation. Will a State be prejudiced by a good road passing through it, which will increase its population and wealth, and cause busy villages to rise up, and industry to be excited on the whole line? Will it make any difference to the owner of land, whether he is paid by a State or by the United States? Will the heads or hearts of the appraisers be changed by the circumstance of their acting as citizens of the United States? Will the travellers care whether the gates are erected by a State or the General Government? Individuals who commit any injury to the works, as in the case of those who obstruct the mail, would be liable to federal jurisdiction. This, however, formed no objection in the mind of Mr. Monroe; and even this can be removed by investing this power in the State courts, as has been practised in several cases. A fugitive from justice is to be examined before a State judge or magistrate. By a law passed in 1798, "All judges and justices of the courts of the several States, having authority by the laws of the United States to take cognizance of offences against the constitution and laws thereof, shall, respectively, have the like power and authority to hold to security of the peace, and for good behavior, in cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, as may or can be lawfully exercised by any judge or justice of the peace of the respective States, in cases cognizable before them." By an act of the 8th of March, 1806, the respective county courts, within or next adjoining the revenue districts, shall be, and are hereby, authorized to take cognizance of all complaints and prosecutions for fines, penalties, and forfeitures arising under the revenue laws. And by the act of the 21st April, 1808, the aforesaid act was continued without limitation, and extended to additional districts. Again, on the 10th of April, 1816, in the act chartering the Bank of the United States, it is declared that nothing therein contained shall be construed to deprive the courts of the individual States of jurisdiction, under the laws of the several States, over any offence declared punishable by this act. The State Legislatures can aid in the protection of a United States' law; and they have generally passed laws to punish for counterfeiting the notes of the United States' Bank. I think there will be no difficulty on this subject, when we bring our minds to reflect upon it. These offences are rarely committed. I do not, for the last thirty years, recollect an instance on the Philadelphia and Lancaster turnpike, or any forfeiture for the evasion of the tolls. If gates are put on the whole of this contemplated road, I do not suppose that more than three or four cases would occur in a year, and perhaps none; and, as I have already said, the State courts can be invested with a jurisdiction over them. This road would not be finished these five or six years; and before then, the country, I presume, will come to some practicable result as to the mode of repairing national roads. The repairs, in my opinion, ought to be made out of the money of those who use the roads. It cannot be expected that the General Government will annually appropriate money to repair roads. The best policy will be, to construct or to aid in the construction of roads, and afterwards let them maintain themselves, which they will always be capable of doing.

The constitutional question, I think, in the language of Mr. Madison, ought to be precluded: yet other gentlemen may not agree with me in this opinion; and, as this is the last time that ever I expect to speak at large on this subject, I wish to comprise the whole case in my observations.

I will premise that the power is one which Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Monroe thought ought to belong to the General Government. They did not view it as obnoxious in its character, and dangerous to liberty; but as the means of binding the Union together, and of promoting the best prosperity of the country. The case is stripped of every odious feature, and resolves itself into a naked question of constitutional law. The only difference between the illustrious gentlemen, whose names I have so repeatedly mentioned, is, that the friends of national improvements believe that Congress possesses the power already. These three Presidents were so ardent on the subject, that they recommended a change in the constitution. We say that no change is necessary—that the constitution is a sacred instrument, and should never be touched without fear and trembling. For my own part, I think I never will vote to amend it, except to elect the President for a single term. Neither of the Presidents alluded to were ever suspected of being unfriendly to State rights, or inclined to invest the General Government with unreasonable power.

Although this subject has been discussed so often, I do not recollect that a passage in the Federalist relating to it has ever been read. In No. 14, the objection drawn against the constitution, from the extent of country, was answered. In this answer, speaking of the effects of the constitution, it is said: "Let it be remembered, in the third place, that the intercourse throughout the Union will be daily facilitated by new improvements. Roads will every where be shortened and kept in better order; accommodations for travellers will be multiplied and ameliorated. An interior navigation on our Eastern side will be opened throughout, or nearly throughout the whole extent of the thirteen States. The communication between the Western and Atlantic districts, and the different parts of each, will be rendered more and more easy, by those numerous canals with which the beneficence of nature has intersected our country, and which art finds it so little difficult to connect and complete." It is evident that the writer contemplated this to be effected by the General Government. He was speaking of the effects of the Union, and he never could have anticipated that the grand canal alluded to would ever be made by the States. The States could make no compact with each other, for this purpose, without the consent of Congress. The power was taken from them, and it naturally went to the General Government, until it should be receded in the mode prescribed. Can it be expected that the States will enter into compacts to make roads, calculated more for national than local purposes, and then come to Congress for their consent? If we place our reliance on the States, the road in question will not be made for a thousand years to come. In the discussion of constitutional questions, we must consider ourselves as citizens of the United States, as well as of the particular State to which we belong. The rights of each should be cherished with equal zeal.

The constitution has invested Congress with certain enumerated powers, and I have always concurred in the opinion that the common defence and general welfare of the United States is to be obtained by the due exercise of these powers; otherwise, there would be no limits.

But the framers of the constitution foresaw that Congress would frequently have to legislate on implication, in relation to those powers; and to remove all doubts as to the right, they gave this general power by an express grant—a power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers; and other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. From the nature of this power, no boundaries could be given. It is left on the broad ground of genuine construction. It is no longer an implied power; it is a construction of the constitution, under an express authority to do so; it is not restricted as to objects, nor is it confined to times of war or peace. Most of the express powers were acted upon in the early days of the Government, and the principal acts of legislation since have been founded on constructive powers. The promotion of the public welfare, as expressed in the constitution, may be considered as an intimation for a liberal construction, where the object leads to the good and prosperity of the country.

It has always seemed strange to me that this constructive power should be acquiesced in so generally, and yet denied for the purpose of improving the country.

We are never a week in session, without acting upon these constructive powers. Our statute books are full of instances. There are the laws relating to fugitives, who are held to service or labor, in any of the States. The laws relating to the carrying of the mail, the military academy, pensions, navy hospitals, and trading-houses among the Indians, are all creatures of constructive powers. So are the laws relating to our fortifications, light-houses, and revenue cutters. In the same class, may be placed the practice of clearing rivers, removing sand-bars, improving harbors, and erecting breakwaters. In the same class, also, may be considered the laws concerning vaccination, the cultivation of the vine, and grants of land for education. I cannot remember but a small part of them. We do not confine ourselves at home. We have gone abroad, and have granted money to the inhabitants of St. Domingo and Caraccas; and we conveyed General Lafayette to his native home, in a national ship of the line. By mere implication through the treaty-making power, territories have been acquired, which are larger than European empires, and, under the same constructive powers, the inhabitants have been received into the American family, and made citizens. Even in our every day affairs, we see the same thing; we do not enjoy our library, maps, or stationery, by any express power.

We are not only in the practice of making laws, which are the mere offspring of constructive power, but we enforce those laws by the highest penalties, and inflict the sanguinary punishment of death.

The gentlemen who oppose the power, fall, as I think, into a capital error. They suppose that a jurisdiction over the ground occupied by the road, would be acquired by the General Government; this is not the case. Any crime committed on it would remain, as before, cognizable in the State courts. Congress would only have a protecting power over its own law, as in every other case. Whenever Congress has a constitutional power to make a law, it has the power to prevent the object of the law from being defeated. Congress pass laws to inflict punishments for obstructing the mail; still a larceny committed in the mail coach, or in a United States' court-house, would only be of State cognizance. We are familiar with these protecting laws; the sea, for a certain distance, belongs to the adjacent States, as a part of their domain; but such parts of the sea and the mouths of rivers are covered with revenue cutters, possessing high and arbitrary powers, such as boarding a vessel by force, and nailing down the hatches; yet these acts, which are merely to protect a United States' law, have never been considered as any infringement of State rights. President Monroe, in his views, agrees that Congress can appropriate money to make a road, but this, he thinks, would exhaust their power. They cannot put a toll gate upon it, and inflict penalties for any injury done, as this would give jurisdiction.

Here consists the grand fallacy, this ideal fancy of jurisdiction. What jurisdiction, I will ask, attends such a law, that does not follow every act passed by Congress, a mere power of protecting constitutional legislation? Congress cannot pass a single law which may not increase the business of the United States' courts; but it is no new species of jurisdiction—it is a mere right to interpret the main part of the act, and of the provisions designed to enforce it. If the law itself is constitutional, it is too much to say that it cannot be protected by the usual penalties.

Is it possible that Congress can Macadamize a road, and build splendid bridges, and that the first set of disorderly men who may pass along, can, with impunity, defeat the whole, by tearing up the stones and demolishing the bridges?

I confess that I cannot understand the doctrine, which goes to say that money in the treasury may be appropriated to a particular object, when we would have no right to send a tax gatherer to collect money for the same object.

The power to lay and collect taxes is co-extensive with the power to appropriate. But it is said that the mere appropriation imposes no burden on the people. This is an evident mistake. The money in the treasury belongs to the people as well as the money in their pockets, and Congress cannot touch a cent of either, unless it is to carry into effect some expressed or implied provision of the constitution. I feel a clear and full confidence that there is not the slightest foundation for the distinction; and I am persuaded that every candid mind, on reflection, however dazzled at first, will abandon it. I hold it to be universally true, that whenever Congress can make an appropriation, it can prevent the law from being defeated by the usual penalties, when necessary.

The people wish the exercise of this power; they welcome the engineers and surveyors; they rejoice to see them; and the only want of harmony that exists, is a contest as to the route of the road. In all the cases of surveys, with a view to internal improvements, no interruption has been interposed in a single instance. On the floor of Congress, the subject has undergone generous and animated debates; and the power has always been sustained from the date of the Cumberland road, in 1806, to the present time; and roads have been frequently made to and in the new States, which could not be done if the power did not exist. Congress has no power, nor can have any, that is not derived from the constitution.

In 1818, a resolution passed this House, asserting the power to construct post roads, military roads, and other roads, and to improve watercourses. And a resolution passed, directing the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury to report plans for internal improvements. The Secretary of War did report on the subject at the next session, and the Secretary of the Treasury would also have reported, if he had not been prevented by indisposition.

Congress has solemnly acted on this power on two occasions. First, in the passage of a law in both Houses, to set apart the bonus and dividends of the Bank of the United States as a fund for internal improvements. And, again, in the passage of a law in both Houses, for the erection of toll gates on the Cumberland road. It is the genius of all our institutions, that the will of the majority is to prevail. An instability in construing the constitution by Congress, would produce as bad effects as if the same should occur in the Supreme Court of the United States.

If the construction put on the constitution is a glaring mistake, or the offspring of party violence, and dangerous to liberty, let it be disregarded. But when it leads to the prosperity of the country, and the arguments in its favor are respectable, we are justifiable in adhering to the precedent as the evidence of a genuine construction. I will, however, examine this part of the subject, while I am up, a little more minutely.

Congress possesses power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; to establish post offices and post roads; to declare war, and to raise and support armies. The word regulate, as employed in the constitution, necessarily means to embrace any act that will benefit commerce among the several States. Nothing can be of higher importance to this nation than its internal trade; and the greatest embarrassment it can ever labor under, is the distance of the places between which it is carried on; and this can only be subdued by good roads and canals. They will regulate and lessen the cost of transportation; it will regulate and make the prices of similar articles more uniform in the different parts of the country. What other law or regulation could you make, that would be of the same advantage to inland trade? To regulate commerce with foreign nations, consuls are appointed to assist merchants abroad—and we have erected light-houses, piers, buoys, and beacons. To regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, roads have been made in the Indian territory, and trading-houses have been established.

What is the object of these light-houses, and light-ships, and all this class of powers constantly exercised by Congress? Is it not to lessen the price of transportation, by removing dangers, and rendering the navigation more safe and secure?

In these laws, no mention is made of a single article of merchandise—nothing is said about duties, or about buying or selling, or of drawbacks or debentures—the sole object is to lessen the price of transportation. And when we find the power to regulate commerce among the States, given by the same sentence, and expressed in the same words, why can we not apply the same principle to the regulations of commerce among the States? Why can we not lessen the price of transportation? Can any one make a sensible distinction? We do not stop with mere statutory provisions—the agency of the mind and hands are employed; stone and mortar are used; and the allodial soil is frequently called into requisition. Do you not purchase sites, and build custom-houses?

Before the adoption of the constitution, the several States could have regulated the commerce between themselves by the means of roads and canals, or in any other way; but the constitution has restricted the States from entering into treaties or contracts, and now they have no direct means of regulating commerce among themselves. It seems to follow, as a necessary consequence, that the whole power which previously existed on this subject among the States, as entire sovereignties, is carried to the general head, where it can be exercised to so much greater advantage.

Can it be supposed that the framers of the constitution, looking forward to the future glory of the nation, and being acquainted with the benefit of roads and canals to internal trade in other countries, could have intended to prostrate all power over this subject in a national point of view? The framers of the constitution were too wise to attempt to particularize any of the incidental powers. They well knew the impracticability of it. To mention one might be considered as the exclusion of others; and they left them all to the sound discretion of Congress. They may or may not have thought of light-houses; but, if they did, it was safest to say nothing about them; and if such an amendment had been moved, I presume it would have been rejected. It was their study, in those cases, to be general, and not particular. The objects which clothe Congress with power must be national, and reaching in their considerations beyond State sovereignty.

I will detain the committee a little longer, with their indulgence, on the subject of post roads. It is said that this clause of the constitution gives the power only to select a road in being, and not the right to create or make a road. We do not resort to a dictionary on these occasions; but it is of importance to know the acceptation of the word in State papers, in legislative acts, and in other parts of the same instrument. From these sources we shall discover that the word establish means to create, and not merely to designate a thing in being. In the first treaty we had with France, it is stated to be the desire of the parties to establish suitable regulations between the two countries. A similar expression is used in our treaty with England. I have not taken much pains to search for the word in legislative acts; but the committee will recollect the phraseology in many of our acts of Congress. There is an act to establish navy hospitals. Here land is to be purchased, work done, and a building erected. There is another to establish trading-houses to trade with the Indians. The word is used in the same sense in the articles of confederation. It speaks of the regulations to be established by Congress. The word is used in no other sense in any part of the constitution. It begins with the words, ordain and establish this constitution. It speaks of such courts as shall be established from time to time, and that the ratification of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution. It gives Congress a power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and it is evidently used in the same sense in the very clause now in question, to establish post offices and post roads. As to offices, it means to create; why change the words from those used in the articles of confederation, if it was not to enlarge the power? In that instrument nothing is said concerning roads. The words, to establish post roads, must mean to make them, when necessary; or they are valueless. If Congress are obliged to use the State roads, they can have no interest in the route. The mail is not to be opened between the two offices, and the mail contractors would take care to select the best route for themselves.

The power to be exercised in this case is not implied—

it is expressly given; as the word establish must mean to make a road wherever required; otherwise, any State could shut up their roads, and prevent the United States from carrying the mail. When a fortification is made, will any one deny that a road can be made to it? And if Congress can make a road for a mile, they can make one for a thousand miles, whenever the same necessity exists. Suppose an insurrection should break out, and a State through which it would be necessary to pass should so far favor the insurgents as to close her roads in that direction, could not Congress open them? Or, in the case of a war with a foreign nation, if it should become necessary to construct new roads to carry on the war, could not Congress make them? I mean constitutionally. And whatever can be done agreeably to the provisions of the constitution, in a state of war, can be done in peace, as preparatory to other wars. Whatever can be accomplished at one moment, can be effected at all moments. The constitution does not accommodate itself to times or circumstances; it remains fixed and unchangeable.

The objection to the power of Congress, I trust, will soon entirely disappear. There has been a mist over the subject—a kind of political charm, leading many into the strongest inconsistency. For instance, if the owner of a few barren acres should rob the mail, by mere implication, you can consign the proprietor of the soil to the disgraceful punishment of death under the gallows; but as to the bit of land he leaves behind, however necessary for the carrying of that very mail, and for war and inland trade besides, you cannot exercise over it the most imperfect of all rights, the mere right of a way, and to put a toll gate on it to raise a little money to keep it in repair.

A harmonious union of the various interests of the country can have no tendency to a consolidation of political power. The highways will be open to all; and I sincerely believe that the preservation of the Union depends less on the sword than in a kind feeling, which is only to be nourished by beneficial intercommunications. For my own part, I have no fears; I think the Government will last for a great many ages; but, at the same time, we should guard as much against a dismemberment as a consolidation. The doctrine of State rights will always be the popular side of the question; but great care is to be taken lest the General Government should be too much impoverished. What dread is to be apprehended from the General Government? What can it effect against the wishes of the States? Nothing. The arm of the General Government cannot move in opposition to the will of the States. Twenty-four States, organized and possessed of the power to raise money and to equip troops, and being composed of the same people that form the Union, what have they to fear? Nothing. The sovereign power in this country is in the people; and while they remain true to themselves, and preserve the purity of the elective franchise, all the earth cannot take their liberties from them.

The cause I am advocating did not originate in the cabinet at Washington; it sprang from the people, and hitherto has been borne on their voice, and on that alone. The expediency of exercising the power under the General Government has been frequently recommended; but these recommendations have been accompanied with doubts or insuperable difficulties. There has been no cheering countenance throughout from any President. Still the cause is in full life—it has not been repressed. It is a cause of as high importance, and equal in purity to any that has ever been debated in the national councils. It is a noble and virtuous cause; it does not seek to gratify aspiring ambition, nor to exhibit any useless show of pomp and splendor; its sole aim is good of country.

It is a cause that is not allied to any political party, old or new; it has been espoused by political partisans of every description; and it gives me pleasure to know that the late most amiable Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina, was the friend of national improvements. He discerned the power in the constitution, and was convinced of the expediency of exercising it. Than this distinguished citizen, none in the Union was more admired for integrity of character and clearness of intellect. It gives me pleasure, too, to know that his Excellency the Governor of Pennsylvania, in his official character, has recognised the power.

On the fate of this bill, in my humble judgment, depends a large portion of the prosperity and glory of this country for a long time to come.

From this point we are destined to advance or to retrograde; and I most solemnly invoke the friends of the cause to act from a spirit of conciliation, and not to suffer the bill to be entangled with other objects of improvements, or to be separated into parts.

I made a similar and successful appeal on a former occasion; it was in the case of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal. That interesting and highly national object had undergone the ordeal of congressional inquiry for twenty years, succeeding alternately, in one House or the other, but always defeated in the end by a connexion with other subjects.

Many objects of a national character have been presented to the committee; but all cannot be acted on at once. When the question is fairly settled, the different sections of the country will know that their turn will come as soon as practicable. In the meantime, the state of the public mind will be in readiness for more enlarged operations, as soon as the national debt shall be extinguished. We have selected the road in question, as the fittest for the peculiar moment; it combines in a high degree the objects of war, intelligence, and inland trade—the three fountains from which the power of Congress flows. It commences in the regions where the last war began; it passes by the seat of the General Government, and it ends where the liberties and independence of our country were so gallantly maintained, in the person of our present Chief Magistrate and his brave little army.

The cause is magnifying every day in importance; and if the railroad system does succeed, as its friends anticipate, and the power of steam can be applied, as many imagine, and as some experiments seem to prove, the most comprehensive mind cannot foresee the prodigiously improved condition of the country which may be effected in the next twenty years.

Distances will become mere slight inconveniences to the pleasure and industry of the country, and the modes of conveyances over the whole civilized world will be changed.

Patriotic excitements are salutary to a society of people. They delight in noble achievements; the example of the United States may produce an influence on the rest of the world. When we are known to be inclined to reconcile national differences, rather than to excite wars, and are seen devoting ourselves to the happiness of the people, in the promotion of such public undertakings as will advance their interest, and go down to posterity as the best evidence of our solicitude for the permanency of our republic, we can never expect to see a fairer moment than the present to commence the internal improvements of the country on a scale worthy of their importance, and of the public spirit and enterprise of this great nation.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR said that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HEMPHILL] who had led the van in this discussion, set out with the declaration, that the subject was one of great importance; in this opinion he fully concurred; but the gentleman and himself differed in this interesting particular. He thought it important in relation to the good effects which it was calculated to produce; whilst I [said Mr. B.] think it is part of a system fraught with injurious consequences to the well-being of the country. Some of the most prominent of these consequences I propose, in the progress of the remarks which I am about to make, to develop to the committee.

There are some positions which have been assumed by the gentleman, which I do not mean to contest; with a view, therefore, to present to the committee, and through them to the community, the great questions at issue between us, I will first state those points in which we do agree, and then proceed to the discussion of those in which we do not agree, but differ toto cælo. He first told us, that this bill, which proposes to construct a road through several of the States, does not provide for procuring their assent, because he, supposing that we have power to legislate on the subject, considered it unnecessary. As to the truth of this proposition, my mind cannot for a moment entertain a doubt; indeed, it seems to carry with it almost the force of self-evidence.

There are some few of the powers of Congress, requiring the assent of the States, in the very terms in which they are granted; with the exception of these, (and the one in question is not one of them,) every power which is granted operates by its own intrinsic force; it must, in the nature of things, so operate, or it would cease to be a power. That which I have not a right to do, but by the assent of another, derives its authority, not from my will, but from that assent. The proposition may be put thus: If Congress possess the power, then the assent of the States is not necessary; if they possess it not, then that assent cannot impart it, but by the concurrence of three-fourths of the States, in the manner prescribed in the constitution: for, to give a new power, is, in effect, to alter or amend the constitution, and the concurrence of three-fourths is required for the purpose of amendment. Exemplify the argument, if you please, by the case of the war-making power; would it not excite a smile to talk of Congress asking the assent of one or more States to a declaration of war? I will not waste the time of the committee by another remark upon this point.

The gentleman tells us that the public debt will soon be extinguished; that there will be, then, a large surplus revenue, which he thinks ought not to be distributed amongst the States; and that the best disposition which can be made of it, is to apply it to the purposes of internal improvement.

I shall not now stop to discuss our power to distribute the surplus revenue amongst the States, nor to inquire whether, if we had the power, that would be a judicious appropriation. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Whenever these questions shall arise, I shall be prepared to examine them, with all the deliberation due to their importance; the view which I have taken of the subject, renders such an inquiry, at present, wholly unnecessary.

The gentleman's argument upon this point proceeds upon the hypothesis, that a large amount of surplus revenue will certainly exist. Now, sir, it is matter of astonishment to me, that this idea did not occur to the sagacious mind of the gentleman, that it depends upon our will whether there shall, or shall not, be such a surplus. I offer to him a solution of his difficulties, a relief from his embarrassment, by the simplest, the easiest of all remedies—a diminution of the revenue. This idea may be forcibly illustrated by an example drawn from the common principles of household economy. What would be thought of a man, in private life, who was about to build, and whose family required but six apartments for their accommodation, who should erect a house containing double that number, feeling, at the same time, great difficulty as to the purposes to which he should apply the useless apartments? Surely, if his own mind did not suggest the idea, some friendly adviser would tell him that he might obviate the difficulty by building upon no larger a scale than the comfort of his family required. So, sir, I offer to the gentleman this advice: let us so regulate our revenue, as to suit it for the wants of the Government, and we shall be thus happily relieved from the perplexing question, what shall we do with the surplus?

Let us, for a moment, examine the principles which ought to govern us in relation to revenue. Taxes are that portion of the substance of a people which they are required to contribute to the support of Government. True, sir, the money power confided to Congress is, as it ought to be, indefinite in its extent. But why is it so? Simply because, as the exigencies of Government cannot be foreseen, if the power of supplying them were limited, there would be a definite supply where there was an indefinite demand. But, whilst this discretion is given to us, surely every principle of justice and sound policy imperiously requires that we should draw from the people the smallest amount of contribution which will be sufficient to meet the demands upon the treasury, in the prudent and discreet management of their affairs. This is the principle which has been avowed even in monarchies, especially in the country which is our parent State. It was a maxim of Queen Elizabeth, acted upon by her minister, the celebrated Burleigh, that she did not wish to see her treasury like a swollen spleen, and that her treasury was in the pockets of her people; and, at the present day, after the lavish expenditure of millions, the Premier of Great Britain has recently assured Parliament that the taxes shall be reduced to the lowest amount consistent with the safety and defence of the kingdom. Why ought this to be always and every where done? Because, to the extent of the taxation of any country, money is drawn from a condition where it is productive, and placed in one in which it is unproductive; and because this process diminishes the productive labor of the society, and, by necessary consequences, its wealth. And shall we, in this respect, be less attentive to the interests of our constituents, than monarchs, and ministers of monarchs? We, who are ourselves a part of the people, springing from them, representing them, accountable to them, and to whom they have, with jealous caution, entrusted the care of their purse, shall we not prefer a rich people and a poor Government, rather than a poor people and a rich Government? Sir, if we pursue the policy of imposing unnecessary taxation, we may call our Government a republic; we may boast of the freedom of our institutions; yet the people will have a right to say, and will say, we go not for names, but for things; not for form, but for substance; that oppression is oppression still, no matter from what quarter it comes, no matter by what political agents it may be exercised. We learn from a treasury document, that the public debt will be wholly extinguished in 1834, and, except the seven millions of dollars due to the bank, and the thirteen millions of dollars of three per cent stock, in June, 1832. As to the debt due to the bank, it may be considered as paid, because they owe us an equal amount. With so certain and speedy an extinguishment of the public debt before us, will it not be unnecessary and oppressive taxation to continue the present amount of revenue, ten millions of dollars of which are now annually applied to that object? Let us, then, pursue the obvious, the just course of policy; let us graduate our revenue to our demands; we shall then have no surplus to perplex us in its disposition, and to lead us into a mighty scheme of expenditure, for no better reason than that we should otherwise not know what to do with it.

If my doctrine could prevail, I would reduce so much of the taxes as to have no surplus, even though it affected the protecting policy, commonly called the American system; but let not the tariff members of this House be alarmed; for an immense reduction may be effected without injury to their favorite bantling. The report from the treasury informs us, that duties to an amount exceeding seven and a half millions of dollars may be repealed upon articles not at all produced or manufactured in the United States, or in so inconsiderable degree as to be utterly unworthy of notice; and, indeed, I have reason to believe that the repeal may be extended to ten millions, without materially affecting any manufacturing interest. To this extent, then, I have a right to expect the aid, even of the tariff members of this House.

The gentleman has deemed it proper to discuss the constitutional power of Congress over this subject. In this particular, I have determined not to imitate his example, but purposely and studiously to avoid it. But let not any man suppose that I decline to enter the lists with the gentleman upon this ground, because I think the position indefensible; so far from this, sir, I feel satisfied it may be maintained against all the batteries of argument which human ingenuity can level against it. The opinion which, at an early period, I entertained, has never undergone the slightest change; on the contrary, every additional year of my life, every additional hour of reflection, has but added to the strength of my original conviction, that it was not within the sphere of our constitutional powers. Why, then, do I decline this part of the discussion? Because I myself have, on former occasions, in this House, exhausted myself upon it; because, by others, it has undergone repeated and elaborate discussions; has been so bolted down to the bran, that nothing short of inspiration itself could cast a new ray of light upon it; because my observation has satisfied me that constitutional discussions upon any point are in ill odor in this hall, and more especially this, which would be "as tedious as a thrice-told tale;" and because the various considerations of justice and political expediency are ample for all the purposes of my argument.

I cannot, however, forbear to present to the committee a short retrospect of the progress of opinion on this subject, solely with a view to show the encroaching nature and onward march of power.

In the creation of the Cumberland road, Congress acted on the compact between this Government and the Northwestern Territory, stipulating that five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands should be applied to making a road within, and leading to, that territory; they charged the amount expended in the construction of the road upon that fund, and procured the assent of the States through which it was to pass. During the interval between the year 1806, when that road was commenced, and the year 1817, the public mind was in much oscillation on this subject. In this last year, the subject was brought up, and underwent elaborate discussion in this House, upon the following resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole:

1st. That Congress, has power to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military roads, and other roads, and the improvement of watercourses. This resolution was carried: Yeas, 90—nays, 75.

2d. To construct post roads and military roads. Lost: Yeas, 82—nays, 84.

3d. To construct roads and canals for carrying on commerce between the States. Lost: Yeas, 71—nays, 95.

4th. To construct roads for military purposes. Lost: Yeas, 81—nays, 83.

5th. A fifth resolution was moved, that Congress has power to appropriate money in aid of the construction of roads and canals which shall be laid out and constructed under the authority of the legislatures of the States through which they pass. Negatived: Yeas and nays not taken.

Thus, we see, that, by the solemn decision of this House in 1817, all power over this subject was repudiated in every form and shape, save only the power to appropriate money for the purpose of construction.

The bill now under consideration affirms the power to construct, in direct contravention of the recorded opinion of this House in 1817. Thus it is as true of the love of power as it is of another passion, "that increase of appetite grows by the very food it feeds upon." Under the appropriating power, let me say to the committee, that it appears by a report made some time since, that, in the session of 1827-'8, three millions of dollars worth of public lands were given to States and individuals; and that, at this very session, we have applications for aid to the Portland canal, the Blackstone canal, a railroad in Georgia, another in South Carolina, and a third in Maryland; for aid to the Transylvania University, the Columbian College; and, finally, for an appropriation of forty thousand dollars to establish a filature of silk in Philadelphia. I might add, deaf and dumb asylums, and a long list of other benevolent projects, including a memorial from the Colonization Society; but I forbear, from a fear of wearying the patience of the committee. And "last, but not the least," comes this bill. As we are now about to take a new latitude and departure, it behooves us, before we weigh anchor, to consider well what is the port of destination; in other words, to look along the line of time into futurity, and estimate the consequences of this system, some of the most prominent of which it is my purpose to attempt to develop.

But, first, allow me to inquire what are the advantages which are to recommend this bill to our adoption? They must be, that it is beneficial, either to commerce, or military operations, or the transportation of the mail. I will examine the subject in reference to each of these considerations. And, first, as to its commercial advantages. A glance of the eye at the map of the United States will furnish, I think, an irrefragable answer to this argument, at least in reference to the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, through which it is to pass. Nature has stamped upon the territory of each of these States one common indelible feature. That the streams of every size, whether great or small, flow from the mountains, either eastwardly into the Atlantic Ocean, or westwardly, through the Mississippi, into the Gulf of Mexico. Now, sir, the road in question, at least throughout its whole extent, in the four States which I have mentioned, runs almost at right angles with these natural channels of commercial intercourse. Whilst, then, the produce of the country seeks its market in one direction, this road passes in another; and, indeed, if it coincided with the direction of commerce and these natural channels, that would be a stronger argument against it, by all the difference between the facility of water and land transportation. This road, then, cannot stand upon the fact of its commercial advantages.

As little can it be supported upon the ground of its necessity for military operations. When the gentleman speaks of the exposure of Buffalo and New Orleans, the two termini of this gigantic road, I call upon him to say, has he forgotten the vast and expensive system of fortifications which we have created, and with which we are surrounded, as with a wall of circumvallation? After the millions which we have expended in these, are they to be abandoned as useless, for all the purposes of defence? or, will they not be supplied with ordnance, and garrisoned in time of war for our protection? Does the gentleman suppose that troops are ever to be marched from Buffalo to defend Orleans, or from Orleans to defend Buffalo? Let the defence of Orleans during the late war answer the question; it was successfully—nay, gloriously defended by troops, not a man of whom was, I believe, marched from north of Tennessee and Kentucky. If, contrary to every rational probability, such a thing should ever occur, where are all the mighty rivers and canals which surround our borders, and penetrate our interior country? Where, for example, is the Ohio canal? Where that of New York? It is possible, that, in some twenty or thirty years hence, we may have war; say, if you please, in twenty years, for Ferguson, in his Treatise on Civil Society, thinks that a war in every twenty years is necessary to prevent a moral rust, and the dying away of the national spirit; in that event, it is also possible that troops may be marched on this road; but if this road be constructed upon these two possibilities, does it not strike the mind of every man who hears me, that the same thing may possibly happen to every road in the Union; and that, therefore, every road may be treated as being necessary for military operations? The extent of the system, which this reasoning would justify, would be unlimited and illimitable. The gentleman alarms us with the enormous expence incurred during the late war in the transportation of provisions and the materiel of war to our northern and northwestern frontiers. Does he not remember that the two great canals of New York and Ohio have both been constructed since that period; both leading directly to these points? Does he not also remember that the frontiers of both of these States have, since that time, been overspread with an overflowing tide of emigration, covering the face of the country with arable fields, where the towering forests then stood, and intersecting it every where with the roads necessary for their own accommodation? The difficulties which then existed, have sunk beneath the enterprise of our people, and the irresistible force of circumstances. Let us now, for a short time, examine this question in relation to the transportation of the mail.

The whole length of the road, we are given to understand, will be fifteen hundred miles, which, at the estimated cost of one thousand five hundred dollars per mile, will amount to two and a quarter millions of dollars. This, sir, is the supposed cost of making the roads of convex earth, without the use of either stone or gravel. My experience here has satisfied me that what is at first estimated at the whole cost, generally turns out to be but one of several instalments, necessary to the completion of any great work; let the road be constructed in the manner provided in this bill, and, at some aftertime, we shall be told that it must be finished with stone or gravel; nay, possibly that it must be made a railroad; how many additional millions that may cost, I leave it to the committee to conjecture. Indeed, sir, during this session, I have seen a report, which, if I mistake not, (and I speak from a doubtful memory, subject to correction,) estimates the cost of this road, constructed as a proper turnpike, at eleven and a half millions. But let us take even the sum of two and a quarter millions, the estimate of the cost of the plan now proposed; the interest of that sum at six per cent. is one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars: I state the interest at six per cent., because, though the Government could borrow at home, probably, at four and a half, and in England or Holland at three, yet the legal interest throughout the United States varies from six to eight; as the amounts will be drawn from the pockets of the people, it would be worth at least six per cent. to them. Now, sir, I learn the average cost of transporting the mail tri-weekly, in a stage coach, would not, in the more important parts of the country, exceed, if it equalled, fifteen dollars per mile. A report, however, of the Postmaster General, made in the year 1824, states the cost of thus transporting the mail from this city to Orleans, at fifty-two dollars and seventy-six cents per mile: even at this extravagant rate, the whole transportation of the mail from Buffalo to Orleans would be less than eighty thousand dollars, while the annual interest of the cost of the road, without stone or gravel, has been shown to be one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars; thus exceeding, in annual interest, the whole cost of transportation, by more than fifty-five thousand dollars. In this respect, then, I put it to the candid consideration of the committee, whether the proposed expenditure can be judicious. The answer must be obvious to the minds of all who hear me. What, let me ask, is the equivalent promised for such a waste of money? Why, the mail will probably pass a few days sooner between these two points. In the present condition of the road, however, if I mistake not, the message of the President to this Congress was carried from Washington to Orleans in five and a half days; I am well aware that that extraordinary velocity was the result of a great effort to communicate to the public a document in which they felt an intense interest; but if such speed as this be possible by any effort, the committee will be able to judge how much additional time is necessary, with that diligence, which, in the ordinary transportation of the mail, is now usually practised.

I have thus far been engaged in examining the supposed advantages of this road. Suffer me now, sir, to present the other side of the question; a view of the disadvantages, of the many mighty objections founded upon the injustice, the inexpediency, the injurious political effects of this system of internal improvement, if persevered in. In doing this, I shall "nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice."

When I shall have finished this view, I shall only ask you to "look upon this picture, and upon this;" and to say which of the two is the most accurate representation of the case, and to decide accordingly. I beg the committee to understand, that the objections which I am now about to urge, apply to the whole system of internal improvements, embracing this road as one link in the mighty chain; if the system, as such, is to prevail, then I feel no manner of interest or concern in the defeat of this or any other particular object; for though a single object may occasionally fail, by an accidental concurrence of votes, yet all the evils which I anticipate to my country would be realized; and in the general, nay, universal scramble for the spoils of the treasury, a few millions dilapidated here or there would be but as a drop in the bucket, and the whole treasury of minor importance, compared with the injurious consequences which sooner or later, in my opinion, will follow in the train of a system calculated to affect so fatally the destinies of the republic.

The first objection which presents itself to the action of this Government, has relation to the subject of economy. A knowledge of human nature will teach us that the surest safeguard in this respect is the keen-sighted vigilance of self-interest. This principle burns with an inextinguishable ardor in the heart of man; and if it does not point to its object with as invariable certainty as the needle to the pole, it is only because we may sometimes mistake the direction. If, therefore, individual means were adequate to the effecting any given purpose, upon them we might always rely with the greatest safety; but if governmental aid be necessary, then we may rely that the object will be most economically executed under the superintendence of the States. The great advantages of embarking individual interest in such enterprises, are, first, that they will never engage in them at all, unless they will probably yield a reasonable profit; and, second, that, when they do engage in them, they will use their utmost endeavors to reduce the expense to the smallest possible amount. The State of Virginia is acting mainly upon this principle, in her system of internal improvements; they have provided, that when, to effect any given object, individuals will subscribe three-fifths of the sum required, the State will furnish the remainder; thus securing the guaranty of self-interest against the application of public money to any unproductive or visionary scheme. But the States, without the aid even of private interest, will most probably waste less than the Federal Government; they have much less scope for their action, and much fewer objects to which to direct their attention; they have fewer agents to whom to confide their management, and the supervising power is nearer the scene of operation; but, above all, the people, for whose benefit the money is expended, are the same by whose contributions the money to be expended is raised; whilst, under our system, it may happen, and often does happen, that while one portion of the community get the benefit of an improvement, they furnish no part of the means, as in the case of donations of the public lands; and even where money is advanced from the treasury, they may have furnished a very small and unequal share. If this policy be pursued by the States, as it usually is, of always having individual interest engaged, there is a fair prospect of the money invested producing a reasonable profit; and, in that event, through the medium of dividends, there is restored to the public treasury a sum equal to the interest of the capital advanced. However this reasoning may apply to those cases in which the United States subscribe to works undertaken by individuals or corporations, it surely has no application to those which the Government undertake on its own account to have executed; and in those works which the State themselves execute by their own means, they endeavor by tolls to reimburse the treasury for the disbursement, which, in the case of the United States, is not done.

Self-interest, then, may be considered as the central point of economy; the State and Federal Governments as concentric circles drawn round that centre, the States being the smaller, and the Federal Government the larger; and it is not more true in mathematics that the radii which pass from a common centre must be longer to reach the circumference of a larger than those which will touch the one of a smaller circle, than it is that by how much the Federal Government is further removed from the point of self-interest than the State Governments, by so much is economy in the expenditure of public money diminished. For a practical illustration of this truth, I appeal to the Cumberland road, which, for a distance of one hundred and thirty miles, I suppose, must have cost between a million and a half and two millions of dollars.

I come, now, to another serious objection: I mean the inequality in the distribution of our favors. The theory of our constitution undeniably is, that the contributions of the people of the United States should, as nearly as possible, be equal. Thus it is provided that direct taxes shall be apportioned amongst the several States, according to their population; that duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States; and that no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce, to the ports of one State over those of another. But of what avail is it to secure equality in contribution, or to attempt to secure it, if, the moment the contribution is made, the whole effect may be instantly destroyed by gross inequality in making appropriations? This idea may be forcibly illustrated by a familiar example, drawn from common life. Suppose, sir, you and myself being about to embark in a common enterprise, each with great accuracy contributes precisely equal sums, and the very moment the fund was thus formed, you were at liberty to apply the whole amount to your own use, would it not be mockery in such a case to talk of any substantial equality? In the execution of this system, it will be in the power of this Government, at its pleasure or caprice, to increase the wealth of one portion of the Union, and to diminish that of another, without any restraint whatever. Let me suppose a case or two. Suppose the Cumberland road had been extended to Baltimore, no one will deny that the commerce of that city would have been benefited. Of this, Maryland seems to have been aware, because she has constructed a turnpike from Cumberland to Baltimore; but, if, on the contrary, that road had been conducted from some point on the Ohio to Philadelphia, then that city would have received the advantage; and thus the one or the other city might be increased in prosperity, at the expense of the other, just as the one or the other direction might be given to the road. I will put a still stronger case. Suppose New York had not been able, with her own means, to execute her great Erie canal, and that State and Louisiana had both applied to this Government for aid at the same time, the one to have made the Erie canal, so as to connect that lake with the city of New York, the other to improve the Mississippi and all its tributary streams; is it not obvious that, according as we had executed the one or the other project, we should have built up the city of Orleans, on the one hand, or that of New York, on the other? Sir, from these examples, it is impossible not to see that the relative wealth and importance of the different portions of the Union might be made to depend upon the favor which they might respectively find here. Our revenue being raised almost exclusively by imposts, the attention of the people at large is not drawn so closely to it. To test the justice and policy of this system, I appeal to gentlemen to say whether they would venture to impose a direct tax, to the amount of millions, and then apply the proceeds to the improvement of particular parts of the country. I undertake to answer no; and, let me tell them that if they were to try the experiment, the people would soon arrest them in their course. We sometimes hear it said, that, as the United States are one great whole, whatever benefits one of the parts is a benefit to the whole. This, sir, I acknowledge, is too lofty a magnanimity, too expansive a patriotism, for me to pretend to. Say what you will, reason as you will, as long as man is man, the States, and the people of the States, will never forget their individuality; they will never consent that the fruits of their labor shall go to enrich others. Let me test this principle by a case. I suppose that some five or six millions would probably improve all the important rivers in Virginia. I call upon the members from Massachusetts to say whether they would impose a direct tax upon their constituents to effect this object. If they would not, and I am sure they have too much candor to say that they would, then this high-minded disinterestedness will do well "to point a moral or adorn a tale," but will not do for practical life.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

Nor, sir, is the objection on account of inequality at all obviated by the common remark, that our resources are to be applied to national objects. National objects! Where is the criterion by which we are to decide? What comes up to this standard, and what does not? We have none but the opinions of members here; and, whenever the question comes to be decided, rest assured that each individual member will think that the project which he presents has the stamp of nationality. And what, sir, will be the necessary result in practice? I make, now, no invidious distinctions between North and South, East and West; we are all men, and have all the feelings and passions of men. Many projects will be presented at a given session; the disposable funds will not be adequate to the completion of them all. Then will come the "tug of war," and the struggle who shall succeed and who must be disappointed. No one or two of the objects can be carried by themselves, but must get their passport by the company which they are in. Sir, the inevitable result will be combinations and arrangements, so as to unite a sufficient force to carry through a number of different objects, neither by its own intrinsic weight, but all by the united weight of all. This will generate feuds and heart-burnings in those who are defeated. It will, it must be so: for it is not in human nature for either States or individuals, without murmuring or discontent, to stand by and see a fund divided, in which they have a common interest, and of which they are not allowed to participate. They will never be satisfied by telling them that their objects were not national, whilst the others were. They will think otherwise; and they will tell the participants in the spoil that they had decided the question of nationality in their own case, and then enjoyed the fruits of that decision.

Sir, I am no apostle of disunion. I look to the confederacy of these States as to the ark of our political salvation. May God grant that it may be perpetual! Sir, I go farther, and say that I come not here with any language of menace; but as the representative of a portion of the people of this country, I have a right to use the language of expostulation. In that language, then, let me warn this committee that there are already points of difference amongst the States of this Union, enough to inspire us all with a spirit of moderation and forbearance. A minority, it is true, but a very large minority of the people have calmly protested against some of the leading principles of policy of this Government. Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, all tell you that they feel themselves to be oppressed. Will you turn a deaf ear to their complaints? Will you pay no respect to the opinion of a large and respectable portion of the community? Will you, because you are a majority, feel power, and forget right? What more could the veriest despot do? Sir, the machine of Government may for a time be propelled by a given momentum, though many of its parts work not at all in concert; but, sooner or later, it must be worn too much by excessive friction; or, possibly, it may become so disordered as to be unable to perform its functions.

What makes this system still more obnoxious is, that some of the States of this Union believe that this power does not reside in Congress, and, therefore, they cannot participate of the bounty of this Government, even if it were offered to them. Sir, I do not mean to violate my promise that I would not discuss this question; but I may, consistently with that promise, urge upon this House the propriety of a principle recommended by two distinguished American statesmen, to abstain from the exercise of a doubtful power. Suppose that you may, as has been said, "by hanging inference on inference, until, like Jacob's ladder, they reach to Heaven," come to the conclusion that the power is with you; I ask, emphatically, is it not reason enough to forbear its exercise, when so many of the States believe it to be a violation of the compact of their union with you? Will you, can you, consistently with justice, proceed in the distribution of a common fund, when so many of the joint owners must, according to their sense of duty, either be forever excluded from their equal share, or procure it only by sacrificing their solemn conviction of what is right to their interest? Though you constitute a majority, yet let me remind you of this eternal truth, that the acts of a majority, to be rightful, must be just.

We seem to have reached an interesting crisis in our political history. During the war of the revolution, the whole energies of our people were concentrated in support of that great struggle, and they went together with one heart and one hand. During the interval between that and the late war, our strenuous efforts were exerted to repair the mischiefs of the first war; to build up a new government; put it into operation; restore our public credit; and, by every means in our power, to acquire a stand among the nations of the earth. The late war again put into requisition all our civil and military energies, in vindication of our national honor. Since its termination, a new era has opened upon us. With nothing seriously to disturb us from abroad, we are left to look at home. The action of the Government has now turned inwards, with an overflowing revenue, and a near approach to the extinguishment of our public debt. New schemes of policy are devised; new principles of government avowed. I fear, sir, that we may find, as other nations have found, that a period of peace, however desirable in itself, is precisely that in which our Government is to be put to its severest trial. Amidst the din of arms, or in the great effort to build up political establishments, the selfish passions are in a great degree absorbed in the more important objects to be effected. These causes being removed, there is now full scope for their action; and it calls for all our firmness and all our patriotism to prevent the injurious effects. Sir, if this Government would confine its action to those great objects, which, in my estimation, its founders intended, such as war, peace, negotiation, foreign commerce, &c., and leave every thing municipal in its nature to the States, we should go on in harmonious concert; and peace, content, and happiness, would prevail throughout our borders. In relation to these great questions, there is a community of interest throughout the Union; as, on the one hand, these must be acted upon by the Federal Government, so, on the other, its action upon them is not, in its nature, necessarily calculated to create strife and conflict amongst the different parts of this great whole. Sir, it is when we pass beyond this line, and intrude upon the field of municipal legislation; when we act on subjects in which the different States have different and opposing interests, in which the benefit we extend to one is at the expense of another, and in which each State can best act for itself; it is by this course that we are converting content into discord, harmony into discord, and bringing into direct conflict those different interests which, if acted on internally by the States, and externally by this Government, would afford the strongest cement to the Union. The natural pursuits of the North, for example, are those of commerce and navigation; that of the South is agriculture. Let each be managed at home—I mean in their internal operation—and they are the allies of each other; the northern merchants and ship owners are the buyers and transporters of southern produce; and the South purchases the imported goods of the North; but the moment this Government attempts to control and regulate the whole, then the conflict begins; for then the regulation which advances the interest of one, by the same operation injures that of the other.

There are strong objections to this system, arising from the difficulty of executing it. If a road is to be constructed by our authority, we must have power to demand the land for its site—timber, stone, and gravel for its construction. How are these to be obtained? The constitution forbids us from taking private property without just compensation. To make this, we must, by our officers, summon juries, condemn the requisite land, value the stone, timber, &c. Is this not municipal legislation? The bill in question makes no provision for this. Suppose the owners of the soil to refuse, by contract, to supply these things, you must go into this whole process. Again, sir, after the roads shall have been constructed, they must be kept in repair. Shall it be done by a perpetual drain upon the treasury, or will you proceed to erect toll gates? Sir, this has been attempted in the case of the Cumberland road, but we have not yet screwed our courage up to this point. Here let me remind you of the solemn conviction of some of the States, that you cannot erect these gates. Will you, in the face of this, press on, and put such States in the painful dilemma of restricting your authority, or yielding up what they believe to be their rights? God forbid that the experiment should be made! I would not have one serious conflict with a single State for all the roads which you will ever make.

There is one argument addressed to the States, which charms like the siren's song, which I beg leave to examine closely, and to expose to the people at large. I wish to prove to them, and think I can, to demonstration, that they are under utter delusion in relation to it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has given us a glowing description of the value of good roads, and other channels of communication; they enhance the value of land, they diminish the price of transportation, they almost annihilate time and space, and, in the fashionable figure of speech, they are to the body politic what the veins and arteries are to the body natural. The gentleman, not content with a mere description of their value, has held up to us, in bold relief, the thousands of miles of turnpike constructed by Napoleon; the splendid bridges, &c.; he might have added the eighteen thousand miles of turnpike in England; he might have gone further back, to the time of Louis XIV, the Grand Monarque, and described the canal of Languedoc; he might have gone further back, to Henry IV of France, and spoken of the splendid road constructed by Sully from Paris towards Brussels, adorned with triple rows of elms; nay, sir, he might have gone back further still, and spoken of the magnificent aqueduct of Rome, her Appian and Æmilian ways. This is the splendid illusion which charms and captivates our people. Until this shall be dispelled, they can never be brought to dispassionate reasoning on the subject. I wish the gentleman had held up to our view, on the same canvas, the thousands of miles of turnpike in England, and the tens of thousands of people, who either go supperless to bed, or are driven by taxation to live on the least sustenance which will support human life; and the seven thousand Irishmen, the most brave and the most persecuted people on earth, who subsist, as O'Connell tells us, each, upon three half-pence per day: so, on the French canvas, he should have presented the roads, the canals, the bridges, and, at the same time, the ruinous, grinding, and oppressive gabelle and corvée: so, on the Roman canvas, he should have presented the splendid aqueduct and the paved ways, and, at the same time, he should have told us, in the eloquent language of a modern writer, "that the pavement and ruins of Rome are buried in dust shaken from the feet of barbarians." Let it not be supposed that I am hostile to good roads and canals; the gentleman may exhaust himself in their eulogy, and I shall not object; by rightful means, let mountains be levelled, valleys filled up—even the Appalachian mountains, if you please, subdued by the hand of man. The value of all this concludes nothing against my argument; it does not at all touch the question at issue between the gentleman and myself; that question is, not whether these things are useful—for that nobody denies—but it is how, and by whom, these improvements shall be made? The gentleman says, they should be made here; I say, they should be made by the States, when thus made. We shall enjoy all their utility, and that only. When made by this Government, I fear, I believe, for the reasons I have already stated, and others, which I shall hereafter urge, that the system will eventually destroy the independence of the States; that the States, in their erect independence, are the pillars which support our great political fabric; that, if these be weakened, the whole fabric will crumble into atoms, and fall with a tremendous crash; that, with it, will fall our political liberty, which, in the language of Cato, I value more than houses, villas, statues, pictures—and I will add, roads, canals, and bridges. Give me a people who are free, happy, and not oppressively taxed; though in the plain garb of republican simplicity, rather than one weighed down by oppression, though surrounded by all the monuments of the arts. A nation in this last condition may be aptly represented by the description which has been given of a splendid city, that, when viewed at a distance, you behold only lofty turrets, magnificent steeples, and superb edifices; but when you shall have entered in, and taken a closer view, you find wretched hovels, dark and narrow alleys, which shut out the light of heaven, and, I will add, many of those who inhabit these abodes, with famine in their eyes, and ragged misery on their backs.

I now beg leave to address myself to the sober sense, the interest, nay, the pride of the States, and the people of the States, and to say, as I will clearly show, that if, instead of heaping up their treasure here, they will keep it at home, they can execute for themselves all their splendid works, so eloquently described by the gentleman, without coming here, in the language of supplication, to beg us to do it for them; and that they will then maintain their independence, and continue to occupy their place as a respectable constellation in the political firmament, and not, like little twinkling stars, be so eclipsed by the meridian blaze of the federal sun, as not to emit light enough even to make "darkness visible."

I ask the attention of the committee, whilst I exhibit to them some plain and practical proofs of this proposition.

The revenue of the United States, which is the fund by which these improvements are to be executed, is derived by the contribution of the people of the States. It unquestionably cannot be good policy for the States to furnish it to this Government, to be re-distributed by us, in the form of internal improvement, if that re-distribution be made in proportion to the respective contributions; for then it is apparent that the portion which each State would thus receive back, would be less than that which it had advanced, by the amount of the expenses of collection. What, then, is the only remaining part of the alternative? Why, sir, that the re-distribution must necessarily be unequal. To those States which may receive more than their proportionate share, I propound this solemn question: Is it reconcilable with the principles of justice, for them to make such a demand? To those which, on the contrary, may receive less than their due share, I put this question: Are you prepared thus to sacrifice your own interests, to give up the fruits of your own labor, to gratify the cupidity of those who, in the distribution of a common fund, clutch at more than the eternal principles of justice authorize them to ask? The demand of the one class would be as incompatible with the immutable principles of right, as the sacrifice of the other would be at war with their self-preservation. Sir, the force of this argument is infinitely increased by the consideration, that, as it has already happened, so it would most probably hereafter happen, that the States which contributed the least, would be precisely those which would receive the most—thus presenting the injustice of such a course in the most vivid lights of contrast. And will the States which are to be the losers by this operation, continue longer blind to the plainest dictates of interest, and act as willing instruments in the promotion of the very scheme which is thus to injure them? Do they not, must they not perceive, that it can only be pressed for by those States which are to profit by it? If they were to receive their fair portion, they would, at least, as I have said, suffer the loss of the expense of collection; if they were to receive less than their due share, this loss would be greatly increased; it is only, then, because they expect, and intend to receive more, that they can desire it; but whatever they receive more than that share, some other State or States must receive just so much less.

But, I now beg leave to bring this question still nearer home, as to the interests of the States.

As soon as the public debt shall have been paid, if the present revenue shall continue, there will be an excess beyond the current disbursements of the year, probably of twelve millions of dollars per annum. This I will suppose is to be distributed in the form of internal improvements. Now, sir, I will, to illustrate my idea of the practical operation of the system, take the case of some individual States. Supposing, for the present, that each State should contribute a share of the revenue in proportion to her population, and, with the exception of the South, which contributes much more, it may serve as a tolerable basis for calculation, Virginia, containing at least one-twelfth of that population, would advance one million of dollars of this excess each year. If this excess were left at her own disposition, in the course of ten years she could cover her whole territory with turnpike roads, and intersect the whole commonwealth with improved streams and canals. What has Virginia ever received from this Government? I believe the appropriation of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the Dismal Swamp canal. Now this is less than one-sixth of one year's surplus of the revenue advanced by her people. Sir, let me put the case stronger. The annual amount of duty on coffee is about one million eight hundred thousand dollars, of which the twelfth part, the share paid by her, is almost precisely one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the amount which she has received; and yet I doubt not many of my fellow-citizens in Virginia, and especially near Norfolk, seeing an immediate advantage from that single advance, have been charmed with the beneficence of this Government, and its wonderful liberality; though, as I have said, it is obvious that one year's excess of the revenue paid by that State alone, is between six and seven times the whole amount; that, in a few years, that excess, if kept at home, would pave all her roads, and improve all her rivers; and that, if you would even let her people drink their coffee duty free for one year, when you do not want the money, even that duty on coffee would be equal to the mighty boon which she has received.

Let me say a word to my Kentucky friends, whom I value for their own good qualities, and on account of their descent; they are indeed well descended, coming, as they do, from the loins of the Ancient Dominion. She, too, "sees as in a glass darkly," in relation to this subject. For the sake of three or four cents per yard on cotton bagging, and a duty on hemp, which in practice does not much aid her, (for still Russian hemp drives hers for cordage out of the market,) she has gone in support of the tariff; though, by its operation, I think her members here must admit that she does not receive more than three hundred thousand dollars, and pays an import duty of near a million. I ask pardon for mentioning the tariff; but it crossed my current of thought, and I could not forbear to advert to this fact. But to come to her supposed great interest in internal improvement, education, &c.; she has gotten, I believe, one hundred thousand dollars for her Portland canal, and is begging now (I hope the term does not give offence) for another hundred thousand dollars, for that object, and some land for the Transylvania university. Suppose, by importunate solicitation, in the general scramble, first for the loaf which adorns the federal table, and then the crumbs which fall from it, she succeeds in her application, and thus, in two years, squeezes through with three hundred thousand dollars, or four hundred thousand dollars: does not she perceive, do her members here not perceive, that one year's excess of the revenue, contributed by her alone, is equal to, nay greater, than all she has, and will be able to get here, by two years' supplication?

What shall I say to the State of New York—yes, mighty New York—the strongest pillar of them all, upon which this Government rests for its support? If she were to contribute in proportion to her population, which may now be estimated at near a sixth of the whole people of the Union, her whole contribution would approach four millions per annum, and her part of the annual excess, after the payment of the public debt, would be two millions—but call it a million and a half—and how much of the federal loaf has she gotten? Sir, out of her own gigantic means she has completed her great canal, by which the astonished Atlantic, if it has not heard Lake Erie roar, as was said by the poet of the Euxine and the Baltic, yet it has at least been made to communicate with that lake. And what, I repeat, has she gotten? Her members here can best answer the question. She, too, I believe, has some applications to us for aid. For how much? Is it for four or five hundred thousand dollars? Suppose New York, too, to succeed in procuring this mighty sum from this beneficent Government, can she be blind to the fact, that one year's excess of the revenue, paid by her own people, would be three times the amount? I could go on, and multiply similar examples, and propound similar questions; but these are sufficient to illustrate my views in relation to this branch of the subject. And now, Mr. Chairman, let me ask Virginia, Kentucky, New York, and, through them, all the States of this Union, are you willing blindly to give away your own means by wholesale, and then come here, and humbly ask that a small part may be given back to you by retail? Are you willing to exchange the certain independent command over the whole excess of your own revenue, for a doubtful hope, that, by addressing the capricious will of this body, you may have a small part returned in the form of charity or beneficence? Every consideration of interest, of pride, of State sovereignty, conspires to forbid such a course. Must it not be humiliating to such a State as New York, instead of disposing of her own resources, by a sic volo, sic jubeo, to come here with an humble petition? Let us see how it would read. The petition of the State of New York humbly represents, that whereas she has tamely and blindly poured forth her treasure into the federal lap, by the contribution of millions, she begs that Congress will be pleased to restore her some three or four hundred thousand dollars ex speciali gratia, and the petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c. &c. Would she follow my counsel, I would say to her, that she owes it to her own character and dignity cheerfully to contribute to the Government, of which she is a part, her just share of the sum required to meet its necessary demands; that all beyond that she should retain, to be disbursed at her own sovereign will, and under her own exclusive control. Thus she would assume that lofty attitude for which God and nature designed her; and I would say to each and every of the other States, "go ye and do likewise."

When gentlemen talk to me about the beneficence of this Government, in this behalf, I tell them that their charity is at the expense of others: I tell them I cannot understand that beneficence, which, by evaporation, draws all the moisture from one portion of a common country, (I say moisture without a figure, because the taxes are derived from the sweat of the brow,) and then pours all its fructifying showers upon another, thus converting the one into a waste of barren desolation, and imparting to the other extraordinary fertility. If they would take their rule of beneficence from the highest of all authorities, they would learn that the rain is made to fall equally upon the just and the unjust. They might surely so far emulate this great example, as to let their showers fall upon those portions of the country, the evaporation of whose moisture produced them.

Another objection to this system is, that it utterly destroys the whole principle of representative responsibility. The whole efficacy of that principle, in relation to the disbursement of public money, consists in this: that we are to render an account of our stewardship to those whose money we expend. Is that the case in this system of internal improvement? No, it is one of its most unhappy, nay, fatal attributes, that the majority of the members here, by whose fiat the revenue is drawn from the minority of the community, owe no responsibility to that minority, but to the majority whom they represent. Of what avail then is it to make complaint of oppression? Will that complaint be regarded, though it be uttered in a tone of the deepest indignation? No, because the members who may practise the oppression owe their accountability to the very people who are benefited by the oppression, and who constitute the majority. The prospect of relief, then, rests only upon this hope: that the people thus benefited will discard from their service their benefactors, for the single reason that they are their benefactors. They who live upon such hope, must, indeed, in the language of the adage, die of despair.

Let it not be said that the same objection would lie against the action of State legislation: even if it did, I would say, that, because the people of the States must submit to possible injustice on a small scale, it cannot be right that, therefore, this Government will force them to submit to it upon a much larger scale. But the argument is wholly fallacious. There is this striking and characteristic difference between the cases. The General Government, where it makes donations for this purpose to the States, or, as in the bill now before us, constructs the road itself, draws the means from a fund belonging to all the States, and applies it to the benefit of one or more, without even pretending to offer to the others any equivalent; whilst, on the contrary, in the case of a single State, whilst the minority, who contribute to an improvement of which they received no benefit, though they cannot call the members representing the majority to account, yet find their equivalent in this: that, whenever the States do (what they do not often undertake) construct a road or canal upon public account, they impose tolls which are equal to an ordinary profit upon the sum expended, and thus there is returned into the treasury, through the dividends, what is equal to the interest of the capital. The minority are thus indemnified; and though, occasionally, improvident schemes may be engaged in; which fail to produce this result, yet this is the principle on which they act.

Another objection to this system is, that it has a direct and almost irresistible tendency to perpetuate upon us a revenue, having no reference to the ordinary demands upon the Government, but one which will always afford a large excess for the execution of these projects.

What State, or States, which expected to derive aid from the federal treasury towards the improvement of their territory, would ever be found ready to reduce the taxes? Would not the inevitable effect be, that they would thereby defeat the very means by which, and by which only, their objects could be effected? And would we not, therefore, as soon expect that a hungry man would destroy the only food by which his hunger could be satisfied, as that these States would contribute, by their votes, to dry up those fountains from which they expected copious streams to flow for their particular use? Shall we, then, by a perseverance in this course, hold out a constant motive, which shall operate directly against any reduction of the taxation of our people? There are already motives enough of this kind. I hope and trust that we shall do nothing which will either add to their number, or increase their force.

Strong as are the objections which I have already urged, there are others yet stronger, arising from the probable, I had almost said inevitable, political effects which this system is calculated to produce.

From the moment that the present constitution was formed, the public mind was divided between two opposite opinions as to the practical operation and tendency of our complicated scheme of government. The great object had been so to distribute power between the State and federal authorities, that each should be able, by its own intrinsic energy, to maintain itself, unimpaired, within its own sphere, and thus preserve the equilibrium of the political balance. The one party feared, that, notwithstanding the strength infused into the new Government, which was partly federal, and partly national, yet, that the States which composed it would, in the progress of time, become an overmatch for it, and, by encroachments upon its rightful power, produce, first weakness, then anarchy, and, finally, disunion. They reasoned from history, which, as they supposed, proved the weakness of all former confederacies, in every shape; and from what they considered the advantages which the States would possess in any contest with the federal head. The other party took the opposite ground. They argued, that, in the distribution of powers, all that were great and formidable, including, amongst others, the great powers over the purse and the sword, had been given to the Federal Government; and that, therefore, the danger was, not of encroachment, on the part of the States, upon the head, but of usurpation, on the part of the head, of the residuary powers reserved to the States. Let us now consult the oracle of experience, and see how its response settles this great question. Let not the committee be alarmed with an apprehension that I am going to violate my promise, and discuss the question as to the constitutional power over this subject. No; I have no such purpose. My purpose is, to show how even the great men of other days were in error, as to the advantages which they supposed the States to have in a struggle with this Government; and how powerfully this system, in its progressive course, will operate to deprive them of their power of self-support, and still more decisively to turn the scale against them.

Let us examine some of the prominent advantages which were supposed to be on the side of the States, and on which they might safely rely for self-defence, in the event of any collision.

One of these was, that more individuals would be employed under the authority of the several States, than under that of the United States.

Whoever will examine the number of officers in the army and navy, the cadets, the midshipmen, the hosts of registers and receivers, and others employed in relation to the public lands; the diplomatic corps, with all its appendages; all the executive officers, including the President and Vice President, the heads of departments, heads of bureaux, with their hundreds of clerks; the whole tribe of officers engaged in the collection of the revenue; the judges, attorneys, marshals, and others, constituting the judicial corps; the numerous mail contractors upon some eighty or ninety thousand miles of post roads, the eight thousand postmasters, besides others not reducible to any particular class, and many of whom are to be re-appointed every four years, will find that there is not a county, city, town, village, or even hamlet, in the United States, which the federal arm does not reach; he will be led to doubt whether, even in numbers, this Government does not exceed those of the States; but, if to numbers be added the dignity of office, the character of duties to be performed, and, above all, the very high emoluments of federal offices, compared with those of the States, he cannot for a moment doubt but that, in point of official patronage, that of this Government is immeasurably beyond that of the States.

But if, in official patronage, the advantage be now on the federal side, how much more is it on that side in point of pecuniary patronage, or the disbursement of money? Follow me, I beseech you, for a moment, whilst I make the comparison in this respect. I suppose that the annual revenue of the eight largest States does not average more than half a million each, and that of the sixteen others not more than a hundred thousand dollars each; some I know may considerably exceed it, but others fall greatly short: thus, for example, the revenue of Illinois, a few years ago, did not exceed sixteen thousand dollars. I exclude from this estimate county and town taxes for purposes of police; the aggregate, then, of the revenue of all the twenty-four States is about five million six hundred thousand dollars. Now, sir, we know that the average of the United States' revenue, for many years, has not been less than twenty-four millions; here, then, the advantage is more than four to one on the side of the United States.

Another advantage which the writers in the Federalist supposed the States to possess, was, that the powers delegated to the Federal Government were few and defined; those which remain in the State Governments, were numerous and indefinite. The powers of the first, say they, will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce. Those of the other, that is the States, extend to the lives, liberties, and property of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State. I give almost the very words, and in the last paragraph I give them verbatim. Now, sir, if it will not be thought a violation of my promise not to make a constitutional discussion, I will remark that the last paragraph quoted, if you will admit the word "order," assigns internal improvements, in so many words, to the State authority—but no more of that. I quoted this extract in substance, to show that one of the supposed advantages of the States was, that their powers were numerous and indefinite, whilst those of the United States were few and defined.

Now, to prove the egregious error here, I need only state this singular fact, that, whilst the laws of Virginia, being emanations of powers numerous and indefinite, are contained in two ordinary octavo volumes, those of the United States, having powers but few and defined, have swollen to five large ones, exclusive of two containing a general index, treaties, &c. The same writer has fallen into another error. He tells us that the operations of the Federal Government will be most extensive and important in times of war and danger: as far as its legislative operations go, they are more extensive in peace. The writer then mistakes, when he supposes that the advantage, in this respect, is on the side of the States.

All these supposed advantages, then, on which the States were to rely for their own defence, are not on their side, but against them. Now, if to this you add, that upon the system of internal improvement twelve millions annually are to be disposed of by this Government, at its will, is there any man sanguine enough to indulge even the hope, much less the expectation, that the political equilibrium between our different Governments will be preserved? Is there any man so blind as not to see that the scale of the States will be made to kick the beam, by its comparative want of weight? Let us, as a subject of curious speculation, trace the practical operation of this annual sum of twelve millions, to be distributed in favors amongst the States.

In private life, it is a proposition which no man who knows human nature would even doubt, that the person having it in his power to confer an important benefit, will control, may command, the will and the action of one who is desirous of receiving it. Where is the difference, in this respect, between individuals and States? Are States any thing more than large masses of individuals, bringing together all their passions and infirmities? The only difference is, that the command of will and action, where the States are the subjects to be acted on, is as much more extensive and injurious in its effects, than where individuals are the subjects, as the whole population of the State exceeds an individual in number; the evil is indefinitely increased, but the principle is the same.

I will suppose, then, that the period has arrived for one of these annual dispositions of twelve millions of dollars. Various States present their humble petitions; but, according to the principle contended for, this Government has the unqualified power to make that disposition as it pleases; to give to some more, to others less; to some, or to one, the whole amount, and to the others none at all. Think you, sir, that the States which are most firm and erect in the spirit of independence, will be most likely to succeed? Or will it not be rather those which assume the garb of the greatest humility; those which are most zealous in their allegiance; those, in fine, which are most decided in their adhesion to the powers that be? Let me put a stronger case. Suppose that there is some magnificent and favorite project to be carried, and the votes of a particular State are necessary to accomplish the object, and that State shall have been a little impracticable. Think you, sir, that the time may never come when Philip's gold will be applied, and applied successfully, too, by the donor of a road or canal? Let our knowledge of human nature, let the experience of other nations, answer the question. That man had read deeply in the volume of human nature—if I mistake not, it was the man of Pella—who said, that an ass laden with gold would find his way through the gates of the strongest city. Look at the history of England, and learn thence a lesson of practical wisdom as to the influence of patronage. The Stuarts struggled hard to govern England by prerogative; but the sturdy spirit of that nation would not bow down before its power. No: instead of this, the result of the great conflict between prerogative and privilege was, that one of that family lost his head, and another his crown. But what the power of prerogative could not do, has been effected by the still small voice of influence—of influence derived from patronage. These historical facts are an exemplification, in actual life, of the instructive moral to be derived from the fable of the traveller, the wind, and the sun. The wind endeavored, with all its blustering force, to cause the traveller to throw off his cloak; by increasing efforts, he was able to retain it: but when the sun darted his rays, commencing with genial warmth, and continuing to pour upon him a gradually increasing heat, he was finally compelled to yield to the gentler force of the sun, what he did not yield to the greater violence of the wind. Compare the condition of that country at the revolution, in 1688, when the whole national debt was scarcely one million and a quarter of pounds sterling, with its condition at, and since, the close of the last great European war, with a debt then of more than eleven hundred millions, and even now of eight hundred and forty millions. Look at the lofty independence of the Parliament of the revolution, and the relation in which they now stand to the crown. That relation I forbear to describe, because it is matter of universal notoriety, and is to be found in the animated speeches of their own orators. And, tell me, what has produced the humiliating change? What has caused a Parliament, whose unconquerable spirit once “overawed majesty itself,” now to be so tame, so pliant, so tractable, that a reform of Parliament has been, and still continues to be, called for by the nation, in a voice which deafens the ears of Parliament itself, and makes the administration tremble “through all the classes of venality.” The cause is to be found in influence—in those streams of patronage which issue from the prolific sources of office, and the disbursement of countless millions, and which so copiously overflow that kingdom. Her own illustrious Chatham said, that, entrench themselves as they pleased behind parchment, the sword would find its way to the vitals of the constitution. I say that patronage has found its way to the vitals of her constitution. We, too, are men, and cannot claim to be exempt from the infirmities of humanity. The same causes, if permitted to operate, will produce the same effects here as there. Let it be our part (the best service which we can render to our country) to avert from her borders such a calamity.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

Our Government is an experiment, now in the progress of trial, to solve this great political problem, whether it is possible to unite the liberty and happiness of a republic with the strength and energy of a monarchy. Should it fail, the hopes of mankind will be lost, and lost forever. Should the States of this Union ever be brought to lose their lofty spirit of independence, and bow down, in deferential homage, before the Federal Government as supplicants for favors, our political fabric must fall, because the pillars which supported it will have declined from their perpendicular, and given way. We shall then learn, from fatal experience, that the lever of a single Government, whose fulcrum is here, and whose length is sufficient to extend over this wide spread republic, will bear with a pressure so heavy as to crush our liberty beneath it. That liberty is above all price; and, like the golden apples of the Hesperides, will be taken from us whensoever the States, which are placed as the dragons to guard it, shall be lulled to sleep by the opiates which shall be poured out from the federal treasury. To preserve its spirit, requires as sleepless vigilance as did the sacred fire of Vesta, which was committed to the charge of the vestal virgins; the extinguishment of that only portended great calamities; the extinguishment of this would itself be the greatest of all calamities. That, we are told, might be rekindled by the rays of the sun; there is no sun to relume this, if it should be once extinguished, but a long night of darkness will overshadow the land. I call upon you, then, as you love your country, as you value the rights of self-government, as you wish perpetuity to the constitution, to make a pause, a solemn pause, in this dangerous career. I have done my duty—the decision is with you—may God grant that it may be auspicious in its results!

Note by Mr. B.

Since delivering the foregoing speech, a report of the Canal Commissioners of New York, in relation to their great Erie and Champlain canals, has been received, from which the following facts and statements are derived:

Whole amount expended in 1826, consisting of interest on the original cost, superintendence, repairs, &c.	- - - $1,121,388 96
Cr. By whole revenue derived from canals during the same year,	- - - 715,245 89

Balance against canals,	- - - $406,143 07
-------------------------	--------------------

1827. Whole amount expended as above,	993,436 59
Whole revenue from canals,	- - - 846,651 73

Balance against canals,	- - - $146,784 86
-------------------------	--------------------

--	-----------------

1829. Upon same principles, a balance of expenses over and above the revenue for this year. Balance against canals,	$110,623 51
---	--------------

It appears from that report, that the whole amount of the debt, which the commissioners thought justly chargeable to the canals at the close of the year 1826, was ten millions two hundred and seventy-two thousand three hundred and sixteen dollars and seventy-six cents; and that this debt, instead of having been reduced by the tolls on the canals, has increased each year; so that, on the 1st of January, 1830, it amounted to eleven millions three hundred and ninety-eight thousand seven hundred and ninety-six dollars and twenty-two cents. Add the deficits for the four years, with interest on them, makes the whole debt chargeable to the canals on the 1st of January, 1830, twelve millions two hundred and thirty-seven thousand three hundred and ninety-nine dollars and seventy cents.

The report adds, that, supposing the canals to have increased the duty on salt thirty-three and one-third per cent., and to have added two or three per cent. to the duties on sales at auction, still, regarding them in the most favorable light in which any reasonable calculation can place them, the canals have done nothing towards the extinguishment of their debt, together with the moneys expended upon them for superintendence and repairs. That, with respect to the tolls on the descending trade, they cannot be advantageously increased; and they only estimate every increase which can be made of the tolls on the ascending trade at thirty-five thousand dollars.

If, then, in these canals, opening the one to Lake Champlain, and the other through Lake Erie, the most extensive which can probably be constructed in the United States, and where the work has been done by State authority, this be the result, what must it be as to profit or actual benefit from those constructed by the United States? Here is a practical commentary upon the reasoning in the foregoing speech.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 24, 1830.

The resolution heretofore offered by Mr. SWIFT, directing the Secretary of War to select a site for a fortification on Lake Champlain, to report estimates of expense, &c. to Congress, was taken up. The question being on Mr. DRAYTON's amendment, proposing to direct the Secretary to report on the expediency of a fortification on the lake.

[MARCH 24, 1830.]

The question was put on the amendment, when there appeared to be no quorum: yeas, 49—nays, 48.

Mr. LAMAR moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question was put, and lost: yeas, 68—nays, 72.

The resolution was then debated until the expiration of the hour. Messrs. SPEIGHT, DRAYTON, WICKLIFFE, and POLK opposing it, and advocating the amendment; and Messrs. DWIGHT, STRONG, and SWIFT supporting the resolution, and opposing the amendment.

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill "for making a road from Buffalo, through Washington city, to New Orleans."

Mr. BLAIR rose, and remarked that the bill under discussion was one of the few, if not the only one, upon the long list of the bills of the House, which, in its consequences, promised direct benefit to his constituents; that, and the consideration of having presented the subject to the consideration of this House, and having been of the committee that reported it, furnished his apology for the trespass which he proposed to make upon the time and the patience of the committee. But [said Mr. B.] when I look around me in this House, and see the number of friends, both personal and political, from whom I am separated on this question, and with whom, on most others, it has been my pride to act; sir, when I look to the delegation from my own State, and there see, for a time, the line of separation drawn between some of my worthy colleagues and myself, for all of whom I entertain the most friendly regard, I would willingly have avoided saying anything on this important subject; yet, when I reflect that the legislature of the State from whence I come, in often repeated instances, has called upon the delegation in this House to sustain the principles of this bill, and thrice repeated that language to us during the present session, my immediate constituents being almost undivided on that subject, and expecting me to represent their wishes on this floor, sir, I have no alternative, the path of my duty is so clearly delineated, that it cannot be mistaken. I was educated in that school in which the doctrines were considered orthodox, that the representative is bound to obey the will of his constituents; and, whilst I allow others the same freedom of will which I claim the right to exercise, I myself am determined that the sin of disobeying my constituents, knowingly, on questions of expediency, shall not attach to my skirts. They have a right to expect that I will not only sustain their principles by my vote, but to the utmost of my power, in the full use of all the legitimate means with which their kindness has invested me. In doing this, I have the consolation to feel that I am acting in consistency with my own views, and upon principles long established, as to the true character of national policy. On this much controverted question, I have dared to think that all the vital interests of our country, and particularly of the interior, loudly called for a judicious system of internal improvements. As to the constitutional power of Congress over this subject, I am equally clear, and had prepared myself to sustain the views which I had taken; but, from the high-minded, honorable course taken by the worthy gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BARBOUR] who opened this debate in the opposition, I am gratified to have it in my power to follow his example, and exempt myself from a discussion upon which there was little hope of accomplishing more than a useless consumption of public time. With him I think all has been said that could be, in support of that ground; and though no gentleman's conscience could be fettered by any precedent, yet the utility of such discussion should admonish us to desist. Had I been driven into the subject, I consider this as being more defensible than most others belonging to that system; indeed, if we regard it merely as a mail road, it falls within the scope of the express power granted by the constitution. If for military purposes, it is fairly deducible from that expressly granted; else we are presented with the humiliating spectacle of a Government formed for the defence of the people, so imbecile as wholly to fail in the accomplishment of that object. But I will pass on to the subject, and meet my friend from Virginia, and take issue with him upon the expediency and necessity of constructing the road. He has not only tendered to the country his issue, but has embellished his own side with an address so imposing, as to bespeak the distinguished talents of its author. Yet with this fearful odds against me, and relying solely upon the justice of the cause, and the impartiality of the tribunal, I fearlessly stake upon the result whatever of public preference may yet be in reserve for me.

Before, however, I enter upon this subject with the gentleman, I must be allowed to submit a remark in explanation of the reasons which induced the committee to embrace, in the same bill, the Buffalo and New Orleans roads. It is true that the surveys of these roads were separately made, and separate bills reported to the last Congress: but, on the strictest investigation, the committee could see no reason for constructing the one, that did not equally apply to the other, so far as the purposes of the General Government are concerned; they are roads of the same character, meeting at the same place—presenting the like considerations. It was therefore thought most expedient to unite them, and construct from North to South a great interior artery in the body politic, with which, when perfected, other and less extensive intersections might be formed by the States, or this Government, as future exigencies might require. True, a road from Buffalo to New Orleans, in a direct course, would not pass through this city, and that is the reason for the course which is made in its delineation in the bill. But Washington being to the body politic what the heart is to the natural body, (all the great operations of your Government being carried on here,) it is most obvious that this city should be upon the line of such interior avenue, if constructed for federal purposes.

I will also, before I approach the main argument, advert to the reasons operating upon the committee, in giving its preference to the western, as contradistinguished from the metropolitan and middle routes. It is only necessary to glance at the map of the country to New Orleans, in order to see that a road from this place to that city cannot be constructed upon a meridian line, because upon such line your course would intersect the summit ridges of the lofty Alleghany, where, in many instances, the foot of man has been seldom placed; and I suppose it is not expected by any one that our conduct should, in this particular, conform to the ancient Romans, in a strict adherence to direct course, regardless of all other considerations. This road, if made, must be carried north or south of the Blue ridge; and the question is, on which side shall it run? It must be admitted that, for mail purposes, this road would be beneficial on either side, beyond which little benefit could be expected from either of the southern routes. What are the facts? The southern routes, as surveyed, both cut at right angles all the navigable rivers and roads of the south, running from the mountains to the seaboard, the metropolitan at the head of sloop, and the middle at the head of boat navigation. What follows? For war and commercial uses, the benefit of such improvement on either line could only subserve those great purposes on the short distances between the points of intersection. What, furthermore, is the fact? Commerce is carried on from the mountains to the seaboard; defensive operations, in war, necessarily must run in the same channel: this road, then, to the Carolinas and Georgia, upon either route, leads from, not to, the seaboard, to which the military arm of the South must ever be extended. Nobody can believe, that, with a seaboard so extensive as that belonging to the Carolinas and Georgia, and with a population of the character which is found amongst them, their physical force is to be furnished to Mobile, Pensacola, or New Orleans, in case of invasion. It is therefore to the section of country intersected by the western route, that Mobile and the Gulf of Mexico must look for their support. Moreover, this bill is to construct a road through the heart of the country to New Orleans; neither of these routes reach that point, but each terminates on the Tombigbee river, in Alabama, and connects with New Orleans by descending to the bay of Mobile, and thence around by water. On this plan, what would be the utility of a great part of this road, upon the supposition of Mobile or the bay being occupied by an enemy's fleet? Useless to a great extent. Sir, I now hold in my hand the map of the several surveys made by the engineers, from which it will be seen that, if an entire land communication were not the object, the western route, on account of distance, independent of every other consideration, is to be preferred. Why so? Because, if you fancy the Tombigbee river as the point of termination, the western route approximates, within some thirty or forty miles, those southern routes at that river upon which they terminate; that being the fact, it is only necessary to see the extended land communication from that point passing through part of Mississippi and Louisiana, in order to account for the reason why it is made to approximate either, as it regards distance and cost.

But, as I will have occasion to speak more at large in reference to the western route, in following my friend from Virginia, I now come to the main issue. Is this road, and upon the western route, necessary for the purposes of this country on the three great and fundamental considerations which should combine, in its construction, commercial, mail, and military purposes? Following the gentleman's own course, I will examine these considerations separately; and, first, commercial advantages. The gentleman emphatically asked, of what use is this road in a commercial point of view? and proceeded to show that it cut at right angles all the navigable rivers in its course, and would not be useful for commerce. I answer that objection by saying, if his remarks had been applied to the southern routes, there would have been some justness in them; but, as applied to the western route, his objection is altogether gratuitous, and is predicated upon a total misconception of facts. Look, for a moment, at the map of the country traversed by this road, after crossing into the valley; instead of intersecting all the navigable rivers at right angles, there is but one that is in any tolerable degree navigable, for near five hundred miles, (I mean the James river.) If I recollect, the country through which this road is to run, between Staunton, Virginia, and Knoxville, Tennessee, the only rivers upon which it touches, of any size, are the James, New river, and Holston. How is commerce now carried on throughout that section of the country? In wagons, if indeed gentlemen will agree that commerce can be carried on in that vehicle. Sir, I tell the gentleman, that my whole journey from this to my residence (except fifty miles) is upon this very road, and I can inform him, if he did not before know the fact, that the merchandise consumed, as far west as Knoxville, is now transported from the Eastern cities upon that very road, bad as it is. It is no uncommon thing to see caravans of some eight or ten wagons passing upon it to the West; and, in the nature of things, it must ever be the channel of commerce for a considerable portion of that interior section. This road, then, whether on the McAdam plan, or that more humble, as contemplated by the bill, is all that some of the gentleman's own fellow-citizens can ever expect; and to them it is what the majestic rivers so eloquently described by him are to more favored quarters. Is then, the accommodation of those who are thrown so far within the interior as to be untouched by the refreshing showers of the treasury upon the tide water, a matter of no moment to the representatives of the people? They are part of the American family; and, let me tell him, took their part, yes, a full share, in the difficulties of their country, whatever may be their portion now.

Let me tell the gentleman, moreover, that, in passing beyond the western boundary of his State, we come to a section of this Union with which the individual who now addresses you has the most perfect knowledge. That is the land of his nativity; and he takes the liberty to say that he does arrogate to himself the right to speak of the wants and necessities of that people, as well as the commercial advantages to be conferred by this road. There the bounties of nature have been bestowed in an eminent degree. Little else is wanting than commercial facilities in order to finish the picture upon which is delineated real prosperity. There you meet with a fertile soil, salubrious climate, inexhaustible mountains of iron ore, furnaces and forges, nail and steel factories, with water power and facilities for all kinds of manufactures. Within the gentleman's own State, and near to the margin of this road, the salt works, from whence an immense stretch of country, east and west, must (in the very nature of things) ever be supplied by means of this road. What is the fact? That indispensable article for animal subsistence is now transported in wagons to the Holston river, within the district from whence I came; and then, relying upon the bounty of heaven to furnish rain to swell the tide, is now transported to all that stretch of country above the Muscle shoals. The advantages of that section of our common country do not stop here. Its facilities in producing subsistence for live stock, and all the necessary means of human comfort, are not surpassed by any other quarter. Yet, what is the fact in relation to that highly favored country? They have nature's rude works to contend with in their intercourse with their fellow-citizens of adjoining States. Need I tell this committee that the edge of industry and enterprise is blunted, for the want of some channel through which to dispose of the surplus products of that valley? Let facts speak for themselves. When wheat, that indispensable article of man's subsistence, commanded from a dollar to a dollar and a quarter per bushel in other quarters of this Union, its current price there was from thirty-three and a third to fifty cents. Why was this? Because of the want of outlets to market. So in relation to iron and all the other products and manufactures in that quarter; and what has been the consequence? Many of the citizens of that part of East Tennessee from whence I came, have sacrificed their lands and surrendered their local attachments, and have gone to other less eligible situations (in most respects) in order to gain a location where the products of the labor of the husbandman would promise a just equivalent, by reason of being permitted to enter into the markets of the seaboard. Thus much, without going minutely into detail, in answer to the gentleman's question, as to the necessity and commercial utility of this road.

The gentleman next examined into the utility of this road for mail purposes. In that point of view, he has conceded, to some extent, its utility; but, upon counting, in dollars and cents, its cost and income, has also pronounced upon it his unqualified negative. If the gentleman imagines that the most sanguine friend of this measure ever calculated upon the road, when completed, either upon the plan proposed by the bill, or any other, being the productive source of revenue to the Government, I tell him that he is laboring under a most gross delusion. Sir, it was never dreamed of by any one of its friends. But it was believed that this, combined with the other cardinal inducements for such work, (I mean the military and commercial uses,) would, when taken together, present almost irresistible inducements to the National Legislature. Do gentlemen calculate the nett income of all their weighty appropriations to the maritime defence of the country? Did they, in the construction of the great Cumberland road, keep in view the restoration of its cost in dollars and cents? No! Like this, it was a matter of national concernment, and was embarked in upon more liberal and enlarged views than those which the gentleman would now extend to this. But let us look at it as a mere post road. What is now the rate of mail transportation upon that route? If I am not misinformed, it will average about fifty dollars a mile. What, is it probable, would be the reduction upon the road when completed? Upon a fair calculation, one-half the present amount of transportation would be saved, taking into consideration the increased travel upon it, and other advantages to result from its improvement. This of itself would produce some forty thousand dollars of a saving to the Government, to say nothing of the importance of reducing the time of travel.

I now pass on to the use of this road to the military operations of the Government in time of war. Sir, whatever the gentleman may think of it, this, to me, is the primary inducement. What I have said in relation to the local benefits, in a commercial point of view, to result from the measure, I wish to be distinctly understood as being accessory to, and consequent upon, this paramount consideration, national defence. This, instead of furnishing an objection to such improvements, on the contrary, establishes their importance in a national point of view. When was it, or where, that a work of improvement, conducing to the general good, did not also address itself to the local interests of more or less of the citizens of this confederacy? This follows inevitably, because, as a general rule, your men and munitions of war are transported upon just such roads, rivers, and canals, in time of war, as are used for commerce in peace. This is obvious, because, in the nature of things, attack will be made at the same places at which are your great commercial deposits. The gentleman has asked if troops and munitions of war would ever be transported from Buffalo to New Orleans, and vice versa. I answer, no. Nobody ever thought of such thing. But it was believed that, in case of war, and Buffalo again becoming the theatre of that war, men and munitions could be transported from the interior of Pennsylvania and the adjacent States, to that quarter. It was also believed, and confidently, too, sir, that, in the event of Orleans being again attacked, troops from Western Virginia and Eastern Tennessee could be marched upon this road to its intersection with the Tennessee river, and, when improved for navigation, could thence be transported to the defence of Orleans; whilst those parts of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, could be marched upon this road. Sir, it was furthermore believed that Mobile being the point of attack, West Virginia and East Tennessee were not only interested in it as their natural channel of commerce, but, from their geographical position, were the legitimate allies of that defenceless point. This road, and this alone, opens to the southern part of Alabama the most speedy, natural, and efficient means of defence.

But, suppose, for argument's sake, I were to admit that this road, running nearly equi-distant between the southern seaboard and the Ohio, and part of the Mississippi river, would not of itself furnish the full means of reaching all the exposed parts on the Gulf of Mexico. What then? Would it follow that this road ought not to be constructed? Surely not. It would only prove that, when constructed, the full means of facilitating the defence of the country were incomplete. I will now ask the gentleman from Virginia, and all who stand in opposition to the passage of this bill, where, on this continent, can they point the finger to a portion of the Union through which a road can be made, combining the advantages that this will afford. I said, in the commencement of my remarks, that it was intended for a great interior communication from North to South, with which this Government or the States might, from time to time, connect other and less important ones, and thereby attach to them much of the value of this great improvement. Construct this road, pass the bill for the road from Zanesville, Ohio, to Florence, in Alabama, and you do—what? You place the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, the troops of which are disposable, because that they have no frontiers of their own, in the condition in which a skilful commander would the interior force in the square of his encampment. You keep them in readiness to push to either point where danger threatens.

This being a question submitted by the gentleman from Virginia to the American people, I shall have failed in presenting it in its true character, if I stop here.

I say to the gentleman, and proclaim to the American people, that this road, and upon the route delineated, in part, in the bill, so useless, in his opinion, for military purposes, is the identical road traversed by the East Tennessee troops for more than three hundred miles, in search of the enemies of their common country. On the margin of this road it was, where your gallant troops encountered the appalling horrors of famine, when upon its line, and not farther distant than three hundred miles from the scene of their sufferings and wo, there was bread, and to spare. Has the gentleman forgotten, or does he suppose you have, that, for the want of this very road during the war, and other facilities in defence, countless millions of the public money were squandered in the article of transportation? Sir, I will call to the recollection of my friend a single fact connected with this subject. In the vicinity of this road, in the southern part of Alabama, the Government was compelled to pay from fifty to sixty dollars a barrel for flour, when, at the same time, the current price, in that part of East Tennessee in which I reside, and which is intersected by this road, has never, to my knowledge, exceeded from three to five dollars. Let this fact, without comment from me, speak for itself.

But, sir, the enormity of the price attached to articles of subsistence, during the war, was not all; your exhausted treasury, by reason of improvidence and prodigality, might, and has been, replenished. Sir, more than money wasted, was the melancholy jeopard of human life, occasioned by the exposure consequent upon wading rivers, creeks, and swamps, on account of the want of the very means of defence now contemplated, and upon the very track delineated in this bill, which, in the estimation of the gentleman, presents so useless a project as to merit an appeal to the source of all power, the people. I ask my friend from Virginia, what estimation he places upon human life? Would he coldly sit down and calculate its worth in dollars and cents, as he has done the cost of this road? Sir, I answer for him; I know him too well; he would not. But, sir, all the arguments and inducements flowing from the practical results of the late war are to be obviated by assumptions of supposed results, which I deny. The gentleman says that things are not again to transpire as they did during the late war; and why? Because [said he] the density of our population will enable the frontier to defend itself. This delve into futurity is beyond my ken, and my objection to it is, that it bids defiance to experience, that surest guide. It is quite too flattering, and is based upon speculative opinion, against established facts. In matters of every day concern, confidence might be elicited; but in a matter of such interest as the safety of the republic, I have been instructed in that school, in which it was an established maxim, "judge the future by the past;" to do which, most effectually, in time of peace, prepare for war; construct this great road from North to South, upon which you will be enabled to throw your disposable forces from the centre to the extremities, without jeopardizing life and treasure—save your high-minded countrymen and yourself from the humiliating recurrences of the late war, here, as well as elsewhere.

I am not one of those who believe that we should act upon the supposition that this country is destined to enjoy eternal peace. My prayer to God is, that that may be the case, without sacrificing too much for it; but, until I can satisfy myself that our country is able to withstand the combined opposition of the world, without the use of preparatory means, I will select the time of peace as being the most appropriate to prepare for war.

The gentleman asks what is the use of the extensive line of fortifications, if we are not to depend upon them for our defence? This question brings to my recollection a document which has been placed upon our tables, during this session, detailing the number of fortifications, and the appropriations toward that system of defence, since the termination of the war. If I am not mistaken, that document exhibits that nearly nine millions of the public moneys have been appropriated to that use. Now, as the gentleman has asked the use of these fortifications, and if they are not to be relied on for defence, I will answer him. Such fortifications as have been erected at the points and places where there is a great concentration of wealth, necessarily must be of great importance in resisting the avarice and cupidity of an enemy in time of war, and no doubt will subserve the end for which they were constructed; but when he asks me to rely upon all the balance, useless as he has pronounced this road to be, I must say to him that I think his great chain of fortifications still more useless. The inutility of them is not all. They lay the sure foundation for raising and maintaining a standing army in time of peace in order to man them; and worse than all, in time of war, your regulars and disciplined troops, who, in the estimation of some gentlemen, are "the salt of the earth," are to display their prowess in defending those monuments of extravagance, instead of bringing them to bear upon the defence of the country. Sir, this is not fiction. It must be true. An invading fleet, having the choice of our coast extending itself for thousands of miles, think you that within shot of one of these fortifications would be the point of attack? Not so. Their attempt would be elsewhere; and what follows? The militia of your country will be called upon to re-act the scenes of New Orleans again. This very disposable force from the interior, and for whose accommodation this road is intended, would again redeem the flag of their country.

It may be thought strange that the appropriations to the splendid sea-wall or chain of fortifications, and the folly of such system, has inclined my mind to lean more strongly to the system of internal improvements, as a more appropriate mean of defence; but I confess, that, notwithstanding the gentleman has so unsparingly repudiated that system, such is the fact. I take, for example, the base line of this road, when completed. Upon it this Government or the States, necessarily, must hereafter intersect other and less important roads, upon which the military operations of the country can be carried on. They will then be brought to subserve the twofold purpose of roads and fortifications. Had the nine millions, which are now buried under piles of rocks in the form of fortifications, been judiciously applied to the construction of military roads and canals, and the opening of important rivers, it occurs very forcibly to my mind that our expenditures in that respect would have imparted vitality to the industry and enterprise of the country, and happiness and prosperity to parts of this highly favored Union, now left comparatively destitute.

I have now followed the gentleman through the course of his remarks as being applicable to this particular bill. How far I have succeeded in sustaining my side of the issue joined upon the expediency of this measure, I leave to this committee to determine; and will now advert to the attack which he has thought proper to make upon the general system of internal improvements.

It would seem that an attack upon this particular proposition ought to have sufficed, and that it should have been allowed to stand or fall upon its own intrinsic merits. But the gentleman has not been content with that course, but has, with all his eloquence and ingenuity, endeavored to fix upon this system that deformity which would subject it to the primeval curse. Sir, if we were to accredit the gentleman, every evil, when traced to its source, would be found to be the offspring of this corrupt and corrupting system. It is to build up a colossal Government here, the shadow of whose wide-spread wings must wither and blight the sovereignty of the States. Whole States are to be bought up, and bow before this Moloch of internal improvements; the chains of despotism and bondage are to be riveted upon the country, by oppressive exactions to sustain this cormorant system. Is this picture real, or is it the product of the gentleman's high-wrought fancy, calculated to intimidate the members who have taken their seats in the present Congress, and stand uncommitted on this great question? I ask the gentleman to point his finger to the fact which would justify this severe sweeping, and, I must say, unmerited denunciation. I, too, regard the sovereignty of the States. I cherish their union as the palladium of our liberties, and would join the gentleman, and resist any incipient measures by this Government to abridge their sovereignty. I ask him to retrace the progress of this system, and to give us a single fact calculated to sustain him in presenting to the country the gloomy picture which he has so unsparingly delineated. If he can do so, I, for one, am not so fond of the pride of consistency as to persevere in error. I will join him most heartily, and strangle the monster before it shall have attained to maturity. But, in the absence of facts, the gentleman must excuse me if I will not run at the cry of "wolf! wolf!" when, at every stage of this great question, that cry has been made.

The tariff is lodged into this discussion, and its deformity is to be reflected upon this measure. We are called upon to strike at the root of this evil, and repeal that odious system of exaction which robs one portion of the community to enrich another. I answer, that effort has been made. I have acted with the gentleman from Virginia, and we have been in the minority. Thus far, we agree; and the point at which we separate is, the use to which this redundant revenue, raised without our consent, shall be applied. He is for having none to appropriate. Agreed. But what are we to do with that which has accrued, and will hereafter arise, under the present tariff? Shall it follow the countless millions which have gone, from year to year, to the building of useless fortifications to keep up a standing army; to the building of ships to decay before they shall be called into use; harbors, bays, inlets, and the thousand other projects upon tide water? or shall a small rivulet be diverted from that channel, and be directed to the interior to fructify a quarter of this Union in which the operations of this Government have been felt only in its requirements and exactions, without the first act of parental care being extended to much the greater portion? Will my friend from Virginia tell me how, and in what way, the State from whence I come can ever expect a return of the money indirectly taken from the pockets of its citizens, unless it be under this very system? Does he calculate upon a diminution of revenue, until the public debt shall have been paid; and, when reduced, that there will be a foresight and sagacity sufficient to so regulate that complicated machine, as to bring its operation just to the point of ordinary disbursement? Acting upon the principles by which I am governed, I need not look forward to the extinction of the public debt; sufficient for the day is the evil thereof; we have now revenue to be used, over and above the necessary expenditures of the Government, and the operations of the sinking fund, and the question is narrowed down to a mere choice of alternatives. I have thought that it could not be so beneficially applied in any other manner, as in constructing this great interior highway, which, in time of war, would be a secure route for carrying on with activity the operations of the Government, as well as intercourse among the States. Believing that Congress does constitutionally possess the power to construct roads and canals for national purposes, what would the gentleman do, were he from the State from whence I come? Would he stand with folded arms, and see the revenue, raised, if you please, without his consent, poured out in an unremitting sluice upon those sections of this Union to which the kindness of Providence had given much; and to accomplish for them still more, the little must be taken from those who were forced to contend with nature's parsimony? Sir, I may be under delusion upon this subject; if so, I wish to be corrected. I have said, that, under the system of internal improvements, and that alone, can the interior parts of this Union participate in the disbursements of this Government? I ask the citizens of my own State what has been the course of things heretofore? More than three hundred millions of revenue, collected since the war—where has it gone? I mean that, over the ordinary expenses of the Government, and the public debt? To the seaboard. How much has been expended since the war, amongst you? The salaries of your federal officers, and no more. What, aside from opening your roads and rivers, can you expect hereafter? Nothing.

I am not so credulous as to believe that that sluice, which was kept running when the public debt was at its maximum, is now to be closed, when it is reduced to a mere point. As, then, one of the Representatives from the interior, I will attempt to divert a part of the great current running to the seaboard, and, by my influence, send a rivulet to fructify that goodly land, which has been neglected. I speak feelingly; it has, emphatically, been overlooked.

If I am correct in the view which I have taken of the disbursements of the Government for the past; and if it be true that from three to five millions of the treasury, common to all, have, year after year, regardless of the public debt, when at its maximum, been diverted to purposes less important to the Union than this great road; what is the fair, nay, inevitable inference? Surely it is, that, before the close of this Congress, the sum embraced in this bill will be appropriated to the object to which it refers, or, in the event of its failure, will be hypothecated to some other project, if not altogether useless, greatly inferior to it in point of national importance.

I look upon the attempt to throw upon this measure the weight of the tariff, as being altogether gratuitous. That policy, as I before hinted, has been settled, at all events until the extinction of the public debt. Why has it been dragged into this debate? The reason must be obvious to every one; and, without charging it to mal-motive in the gentleman, whose candid, fair, and open course in debate I have always admired, I will say it was calculated, if not designed, to unite, in common cause, all who were hostile to either measure.

We have been gravely asked if we would levy upon our constituents a direct tax, in order to carry on this system. I can only speak for myself; I answer, no. I go much further; I tell the gentleman nor would I for much the greater number of projects which have been the objects of peculiar care to this Government. I would not, by my vote, levy a direct tax to continue the gentleman's splendid sea-wall, or chain of fortifications; the building of useless ships to decay in time of peace; the military academy; the mammoth pension bills; in short, for none of the paraphernalia of seaboard extravagance. Answering this question to his satisfaction, is no reason for rejecting this bill. Having answered what I would not do, I will now tell him what I would. A wise and prudent individual, in the management of his own concerns, will act with reference to his resources. When circumscribed, he will contract his expenditures; when redundant, they will be more enlarged. So of a Government; if possessed of the means, I would build this road; deprived of them, I would, from necessity, abandon it.

We are pathetically asked by the gentleman, how is this system to be gotten clear of? and will we, because we have the power, continue its exercise, when that course is calculated to produce discontent and heart-burnings. As to the getting clear of this system, I can only say to the gentleman, the remedy is with the American people, to whom his eloquent appeal has been made. This system is the workmanship of their hands, reared up against the technicalities of constitutional disquisitions, though, under the most embellished pictures of the expediency of such system—to the revolution which the gentleman is attempting to produce, I can assure him that I will bow with the most profound respect. I am on the safe side on that subject. When it shall happen that the people, to whose will I shall always yield obedience, become tired of this system, there will be no such spectre in the path of obedience as the ghost of the constitution; no, it will be a mere question of expediency.

As to "discontent and heart-burnings," I can assure the gentleman that I regret the necessity of such a state of things as much as he can; but does not his own experience teach him that that is the inevitable result of all that legislation which relates to matters of great interest? Can he suppose that man, in his imperfect state, prompted by ambition, interest, or whatever passion may be addressed, when brought in conflict with an antagonist feeling, and has failed in the attainment of his object, should be exempt from that condition? Are we then to surrender that for which we have contended for years; and which, in our deliberate judgments, conduces to the essential and permanent interests of the country, because of the minority being dissatisfied? Far as I would advance to give satisfaction to any quarter of this country, this would be going too far. It would, when carried out to its full extent, prevent legislation from being enforced; and, therefore, none should be adopted. I ask, what would have been the consequence of yielding to discontent on the part of the minority, when your Government thought it expedient to lay the embargo, declare war, pass a tariff, or a mammoth pension bill? Surely the answer is, that none of these measures would have been enforced. Different opinions are entertained by different gentlemen, as to the tribunal provided by the constitution for determining upon the constitutionality of laws passed by Congress. If, however, it should turn out to be a casus emissus in that instrument, I would then say, that, in the absence of a more appropriate tribunal, I am, until the case can be better provided for, content to refer the legislation of this House to the ordeal of the source of all power, at the ballot boxes—I mean the people. If no where else, there is there a redeeming spirit, that will not long suffer their servants to be the willing instruments of unjust oppression, "heart-burnings, and discontent," to any portion of their fellow-citizens. If this system had been what it has been characterized by the gentleman from Virginia, that of plunder, bargain, intrigue, and corruption, a virtuous people would, before this, have frowned into retirement the actors in a work so unholy. But I must console my friend from Virginia, by informing him that there are two sides to this picture, and he has only looked upon one. I turn him to the other, and ask him to look upon it. I hold up to his view that which was commenced by him who had been styled "the Apostle of Liberty;" I mean the illustrious Jefferson, and "though he is dead he yet speaketh." On his side of the picture, he represented roads and canals as great foundations of union and prosperity. All who have succeeded him to the office of Chief Magistrate entertained the same opinion as to the expediency and utility of such works; the high authority of their names are furnished us, in opposition to the appalling picture drawn by the gentleman. Again, for his comfort under this "new era" of improvement, I beg to refer him to the discussions of 1824 upon the surveys bill, which, by all, was considered the entering wedge to this much abused system, and he will there see that this road, now considered so superlatively useless, was avowed openly as a component part of it. It was surveyed and reported upon, amongst the first works of that day, and has been ever since considered worthy of occupying a place on the calendar of business in this House. So far, then, as this particular branch of that system extends, it is no "new era" in improvements. I recur to the celebrated report of Mr. Gallatin, in 1801-'2, and I there see a forcible recommendation, not of this particular road as delineated, but of a great interior communication from North to South; but I will dismiss the subject, by remarking that this Government, when men had not become so refined in constitutional disquisitions, did construct a road from Nashville to New Orleans, the trace of which yet remains; to the period of constructing which I refer the learned gentleman from Virginia, as the "era of internal improvements," to which this branch may be referred. That road was constructed by the money and troops of the Federal Government, through the territory of the States, and without their consent.

I ask, were there no patriots then to warn us of the yawning gulf of "consolidation?" No friend to State rights to raise the veil of futurity, and paint the gloomy picture of masters bowing, and cringing, and begging to their servants for a crumb from their own table? No! All was silence. It was reserved to other men and better days to spy the evil, and save the republic.

Having followed my friend from Virginia through such of his remarks as I thought it my duty to answer, and having feebly attempted to sustain this measure against one whose skill and tact in debate I cannot too highly compliment, I must draw to a close my crude remarks. If I have succeeded in showing the utility of, and necessity for, this road, need I say that the States would never construct it on their own resources? Need I say that a project uniting in interest seven States, acting only within their local limits, could not act in unison, so as to accomplish its construction? To which, I would ask, would it suggest itself as an object of primary importance, when viewed alone, as a highway for the State? None. It is one of those great objects eminently stamped with the impress of nationality, and which, alone, the comprehensive grasp of federal legislation can accomplish.

But the cost is objectionable. We have been told that, whilst the bill appropriates two millions and a quarter, this sum will only blaze out the way for this mammoth undertaking—that countless millions must follow to its final completion. Sir, it seems that this dish cannot be rendered savory to the appetites of our opponents. This bill, which has been drawn with more than ordinary care, to steer clear of the very objection of the gentleman, so much so as to require an estimate of the cost of each mile, bridge, and causeway, and that estimate to be submitted to the President of the United States, and must fall within the average of fifteen hundred dollars a mile, or the road is not to be constructed—this abundant precaution will not satisfy the gentleman. I must be allowed to say, that, in my humble opinion, as regards this objection, the defect is in the appetite of the gentleman, and not in the aliment provided. If commenced under such estimate, falling within fifteen hundred dollars a mile, it is to be completed, as a road of the description specified in the bill. I entertain no doubt of the perfect adaptation of such road to all the exigencies of the country through which it is to pass. I know, upon part of that road, the application of stone would not only be useless, but detrimental.

But I will not disguise my views as to the ultimate destination of this improvement. I have said that I believe it will subserve all the purposes of the Government, upon the plan proposed; but if, upon actual experiment, the increased necessities of the country should demand its construction upon a more elevated plan, we have it in readiness for the application of metal, or rails, whenever the resources of the treasury, and the importance of the work, shall suggest itself to the wisdom of our successors as being advisable: not under any pledge upon the face of this bill, or the consummation of the present projected plan, but resting alone upon the future developments of its high utility.

I have now done with this subject; but, before I take my seat, I must say a word to the friends of internal improvements. Seven years ago I took my seat in this hall; since when, I have been an advocate for such improvements as addressed themselves to the exigencies of the nation at large. I have doubted neither the constitutionality nor expediency of that measure.

We have been told by the gentleman from Virginia, that this was a system, the operation of which was to buy up not only Representatives, but States and communities. I beseech you to contradict, by your disinterested votes, the fearful anticipations of the opponents to the measure. This is a subject which does not address itself to the local interests of many of you, in as much as it traverses States, to the greatest extent, in which our doctrines were not received as orthodox; and the majority of the Representatives of those States, upon this floor, are aiming a vital stab at the system for which you have been contending, in the overthrow of this measure. Let it not be said that you exchange your vote for the gilded bait which a measure of local interest may hold up to your view. It has so happened, that, for the first time since I had the honor of a seat here, a great national measure, including, also, local interests, has been presented for my support. Having voted for the continuation of the Cumberland road, upon which neither myself, nor, as I suppose, any of my constituents have travelled, being hundreds of miles from me at its nearest approach, it was to have been supposed that I would have supported this, which must pass through some part of my district. All that I can ask, is, that you look at this subject as statesmen, giving to it that importance which it merits, in a national point of view; and if you should then withhold your support, you will have done right. Let us convince our adversaries that the prosperity of our common country is the leading inducement in the exercise of the power which we claim. I speak with freedom on this subject, as I have nothing to disguise. Let the opponents to this system succeed in their opposition to this bill, and, though I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, yet I predict that you may bid a long farewell to that system for which we have so zealously contended.

Mr. CARSON made a few observations in relation to an amendment he heretofore offered, which [he said] he would discuss more at large on a future occasion. He yielded the floor to

Mr. ISACKS, who said that he would, on this occasion, follow the example of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BARBOUR] in declining a discussion of the constitutional power of Congress to pass this bill, were it not from a belief that there were others who were not, like him, prepared to deny the expediency of the measure, but who had become persuaded that Congress did not possess that power, and who would entrench themselves behind the supposed barriers of the constitution; from whence it might be convenient to sally forth, upon the position he had long occupied in these controversies. Some defence of that position—some vindication of his own course, in favor of the construction of this road, on constitutional ground, would therefore be attempted.

The federal constitution was, [said Mr. I.] in the language of the convention, "ordained and established for the United States of America." It was made with a perfect knowledge of the wants and resources, the condition and extent of country over which it was to operate. Its energies and benefits were intended to be felt alike, through all the members of the Union, and the geographical features which mark the territory of its domain. The craggy summit, the sloping sides, the long, winding valleys of the Alleghany—its rivers descending to the ocean, as well as the coasts and plains of the Atlantic, were present to the minds of those who set in motion the principles of this Government; and those principles, to be equal and useful in their effects, must have been adapted to the situation of all. And however we may differ about the meaning of terms, in one thing we must all agree, that this constitution, as it is, was made for the whole United States, as they are. This general view of the subject may not be wholly unprofitable to those who have not "ordained and established" their opinions upon the controverted points which I will now proceed to examine.

Among the enumerated powers of Congress is the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." It cannot be denied that this regulating power over commerce may act as well upon that which relates to internal commerce among the States, as that which relates to foreign; and whatever may be done as to one may, in adapting the means to the nature of the thing and the end to be attained, be done as to the other; for the power is applicable to both, and is precisely the same. It is admitted, that, whatever is incidental to the specific power, is comprehended in the grant, and may properly be done under it. The constitution has, however, removed all cavil on this point, by expressly giving to Congress the right "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers by it vested in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof." The constitution means, and it can mean nothing else, that Congress may take into its own hands the management of all these concerns. It is not to stop satisfied with attending to the commerce, or exchange of commodities with foreign nations; it must, when necessary, go further, and regulate trade between different States, and even the traffic with the Indian tribes in furs and peltry; for that, too, is commerce, in the meaning of the constitution. And it is no matter whether this trade is carried on upon seas or rivers, upon land or water, in East India merchantmen, in river boats, Indian bark canoes, or road wagons; these are all but the different mediums and vehicles of conveyance, and are alike subject to the action of Congress, in such manner as may be necessary and proper. But it is said that, to execute these regulations, nothing is necessary and proper to be done, but to make rules—revenue laws, and the like something, on paper. I will not go to a dictionary for the meaning of the word "regulate." I will go to the history of legislation, commencing with the foundation of this Government, and continued without interruption or objection, on constitutional principles, down to this day, to prove what the undoubted right of Congress, under the power in question, is. It has been the work of every year to make harbors, build custom-houses, warehouses, seawalls, light-houses, and do every thing which the convenience of external trade requires. If, then, it is constitutional to do all this for commerce with foreign nations, I demand a reason why it is unconstitutional to make a road or canal, when that shall be necessary and proper for the commerce "among the several States."

In that clause of the constitution which gives to Congress the power "to establish post offices and post roads," as I understand it, the right to make a post road is expressly given in terms, and there is no need to resort to any incidental matter "to carry into execution" this power. The very act forms the substance of the thing granted or authorized to be done. To establish means to found, to erect, to build, to render permanent; and this action of the power, according to the principles of common sense, and the fair construction of language, may be applied and brought to bear as well upon the road over which the mail is carried, as the office or officer created for its safety and distribution. But it is said that the right to designate a pre-existing road is all that is conferred. There is, I think, too much refinement, not to say absurdity, in this argument. Suppose a mail route to be indispensable for the communication of intelligence between two points where there is no road, and where none would ever be made by the local authorities, must Congress wait till the road is made? The establishment of the office is not, or cannot, be a mere designation of it. It had no previous existence. It is and must be made, out and out, by the power of establishment. And why shall the road not be subject to the same power?

To carry into execution the powers "to declare war and support armies," it is "necessary and proper" that Congress should possess and exercise jurisdiction competent to the construction of roads and canals. These, if properly located, will be among the most efficient means of national defence. In marching armies, in transporting provisions, munitions of war, and intelligence, these may be as necessary to the interests and safety of the country as the armies themselves, or any of the mighty agents of the war-making power. To be convinced on this point, is only to look at the face of the country, and the great extent and exposure of its frontier. And if a doubt or scruple remains, let experience point to the expense, the sufferings, and disasters of the last war. Then let reason and patriotism take the place of polemic sophistry, and answer whether the right to construct these communications does not belong to the war-making power of Congress.

These, together with the power to appropriate money, are the grounds on which I rest the constitutional power of Congress over subjects of internal national improvements. Nor do I admit that the appropriating power is general or undefined. It is, and ought to be, limited and applied only to the subjects of legislation confided to Congress, and cannot be extended to any other without a violation of the constitution, and the risk of producing the utmost confusion. I yield the point that the assent of a State cannot extend or add to the power of Congress any thing which, in virtue of the constitution, it does not possess. The question, now and at all times, must be, is the right to act contained in the constitution or not? If it is, the assent of a State is useless. If it is not, then a State cannot give it. I would go further, sir, and maintain that a State cannot withdraw any portion of the power, jurisdiction, and sovereignty, which, by the federal compact, has been conferred on the Government of the Union. As to the rights of the States and the rights of this Government respectively, neither should encroach on the other. Neither can give, nor take away, unless by an amendment of the constitution, in the appointed mode. I am no advocate either for the American system or the nullifying system; and, much as I respect the authority and opinions of others to the contrary, I must continue in the belief that no State, as a member of the Union, in any attitude that it can assume, has the right to supersede or annul a law of this Government. That would be emphatically making a State the judge in its own case. Neither do I believe in the plan I have heard proposed, that the veto of a State shall oblige this Government and its Executive, whose duty it is to execute the laws, to stand still till the matter can be adjusted in some way unknown to the constitution, if I have read it right. I am not convinced that the discussion of these theories can be at all profitable; and, following the example of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BARBOUR] on another topic in this debate, I here enter my solemn protest against all these doctrines and discoveries, at least in the sense in which I understand them.

I will now return to the subject before us, and briefly remark, that, for my own part, I do not claim for Congress the right of exclusive legislation over the territory within the States on which a road or canal may be constructed. This right is specifically given in regard to what is now the District of Columbia, and all places purchased for the erection of forts, magazines, and so on. The express mention of it as to these, and the silence as to other places, if there were no other reasons, would seem to argue that jurisdiction was not intended to be given, except in those cases where it is so expressed. But the power of Congress being competent, as I conceive, to the execution of such works, I would extend it that far, leaving, in the hands of the States, the care of their preservation, and the advantage of their use; and this course has the additional recommendation of policy and convenience.

Let me also notice what I must, with great deference, call an error into which some have fallen. They deny that we have power to make internal improvements, but admit that we can subscribe stock to incorporated companies, and appropriate money or land to States for the same purpose. This I consider a distinction without a difference. Can we enable others to do that which we cannot do ourselves? The difference between doing and causing to be done, is too subtle for fundamental rules of action. The argument amounts to this: that, as a partner with others, Congress can do that which it could not do alone; or, that it may employ an agent, and entrust him with the means of doing that which it could not do itself. I, too, admit that Congress can, in proper cases, make these subscriptions and appropriations—not because it could not otherwise accomplish the object; precisely the reverse: because, as principal, it could do the act, and therefore may avail itself of the co-operation and agency of others. I cannot see upon what principle this proposition can be based, unless it is supposed that Congress has the unlimited right to appropriate money without regard to the constitutional purposes of legislation. The answer to that would be: You say that internal improvements do not belong to the jurisdiction of Congress; the States reserved to themselves the right of making them. And will it be pretended that money can be appropriated and applied to any other purposes than those within the rightful legislation of Congress? I know of no power that could be assumed on the part of Congress more uncertain and dangerous than the unrestrained appropriation of money to objects not within the scope of its authority. On the score of economy and accountability, I think it generally much better that the money for public works should be expended under our immediate direction and control, than be placed in the hands of others, as to whom we could neither exercise coercion nor remedy.

I will now proceed to show that the construction of this road would be a proper exercise of the constitutional power on which I rely. The bill directs its location on the western route; and I will, by the way, advert to some of the advantages of that route over those of the others. I do not expect to say the half that is due to this part of the subject; and the very thorough examination already given to it by the chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, [Mr. HEMPHILL] who opened this debate, and my colleague, [Mr. BLAIR] renders it unnecessary that I should; and what I shall feel it my duty to say will be confined to that line of road between this place and New Orleans, leaving to those much better acquainted with the other portion than I am, the task of doing justice to its claims.

What, then, are some of the commercial advantages of the western part of this road? It has always been, now is, and, perhaps, will be to the end of time, the fact, that much the greater portion of all the merchandise for the supply of Western Virginia and Eastern Tennessee is, and must be, carried from Baltimore and the more eastern cities, over the very ground that this road should occupy. Nor do I mean, by Eastern Tennessee, that part of our State only, which is technically called East Tennessee. A great extent of most valuable country west of the Cumberland mountain, and embracing the broad, rich valley of Northern Alabama, in a high degree realizes the same condition. And when you add to this, the extraordinary capacity of this whole region for the production of iron, salt, and flour, cotton, and other manufacturing and agricultural produce, every statesman must be at once struck with the immense importance of convenient communication, not only to that country, but to all others dependant on its supplies. And how would the advantages of a road east of the Blue ridge, through the Southern States, in this respect compare with those I have hinted at rather than described? Nature, and the unalterable direction of trade, will answer this question. There the road would run nearly parallel with the sea-coast. The direction of their trade is from the coast to the upper country, and vice versa, not along the course of the road, but crossing it almost every where at right angles. Except for the mere conveyance of commercial intelligence, the road could be of no advantage to trade, worth calculating, and so the report of the engineers states.

To show that this improvement is necessary for a mail road, I need only remind the House that, from the centre to the extreme points, it traverses the very interior of the republic. Among the advantages to the speedy conveyance of intelligence that it will afford, there is one that cannot escape observation, when it is remembered that New Orleans is the mart of the whole country through which this road passes, for the distance of eight hundred miles. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] informed us that the average cost of carrying the mail, three times a week, from this place to Orleans, was fifty-two dollars a mile; that the average cost generally in the United States was fifteen dollars a mile. The report of the late Postmaster General, Mr. McLean, informs us, that, if this bad road was made good, the mail, to Orleans, could be carried in about half the time it then required; and I infer for, at least, the average price elsewhere. These facts, I think, are worth something for my purpose, if doubling the speed of the mail the distance of a thousand miles, and saving to the department the sum of thirty-seven thousand dollars a year, are matters deserving our attention. On the western route, we present you a surface that invites by every argument the improving hand of art. Though the country may vie with any other in good and substantial qualities, yet, like others, it has its inconveniences. There we have hills, and mountains, and limestone rocks to contend with; to overcome these, we need the helping hand of the Government. Not so on the eastern route. There, on a continued plain, nature has given you a road of sand; and I have yet to learn how it is to bear much improvement, or where the materials to better it are to come from. The time that the mail to Orleans might be carried, on either of the routes, is about the same. The distance nearly so, except that of the eastern, which is thirty or forty miles longest. As to the important requisites, health, abundance, and cheapness of provisions, and the number and price of horses, the advantages are universally known to be greatly in favor of the West.

If it is unwise in time of peace to neglect preparations for defence in war, the construction of this road ought to attract particular attention. The lower country on the Gulf of Mexico must always depend chiefly on the fighting men and supplies from the upper country for its defence. Kentucky and Tennessee is the natural strength of that vulnerable frontier, but their position is far distant. Our rivers, more than half the year, are too low to afford water conveyance: hence the necessity of a convenient communication by land. Nothing but the sudden and extraordinary rise of the Cumberland, in November, 1814, seconded by extraordinary efforts, enabled the Tennessee troops to reach the scene of action in the very juncture of time. But for that, New Orleans must have fallen, without a miracle in aid of the unsurpassed skill and bravery with which it was defended.

As a military road, New Orleans must be deprived of all advantage from it, should its location be through the Southern States, each of which has cities and seaboard frontiers of its own to defend. The local forces and supplies of those States ought not, and will not, be drawn elsewhere. In any war we are likely to have with a foreign enemy, the South will have enough to do to take care of itself; and it will give a good account of that, or any other trust, for its arms have always equalled the highest expectations of valor and patriotism—nor would such a location be greatly serviceable, even for southern warfare. The march of troops, the transportation of provisions there, like the course of trade, must generally be across, rather than along the road.

The reports of the engineers, already referred to, give the decided preference to the western route; and should the commissioners to be appointed select for the location of the road the most western branch of that route, as the bill authorizes them to do, and as they undoubtedly will do, if my views are correct, there will then be some plain and prominent advantages attained, peculiar to that location, which must put to rest all further comparison. It will unite East and West Tennessee, separated by the Cumberland mountain. It will pass within forty miles of the Cumberland river, crossing one of its navigable streams, the Caney fork. It will cross the Tennessee river probably a little above the Muscle shoals, connecting with the canal about to be made there; and, above all, it will intersect, a little south of Tennessee, the road branching off from the Cumberland road at Zanesville, in Ohio, passing through Kentucky and West Tennessee to Florence, in Alabama, and ultimately to New Orleans.

Here there is at once united the double advantage of bringing together these two great avenues of communication, and the expense of making two roads, that point to New Orleans, from a distance of four hundred miles, is saved by one-half. One road, instead of two, will be the result of such a location. For let the road now in question be located on any other route, it will not meet the road from Zanesville, till they both terminated at Orleans by different directions. These considerations, to whomsoever they are known, must be conclusive on the subject of preference. And I will only add that this branch of the Cumberland road has been surveyed in the direction I have stated. A bill has been reported by the Committee of Internal Improvements for its establishment and construction, and now awaits the action of the House.

The leading argument levelled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] at the whole system of internal improvement, appears to consist in the assumed inequality which the system will produce in the disbursement of the revenue, and the remedy proposed for the correction of that inequality. A successful reply to that must greatly impair the force of his very able speech. This reply is all that I shall, at present, undertake. And, for success in this, I will depend on matter of fact and experience, rather than theories and speculations. It is the inequality of disbursement, without this system, of which I complain; and to effect something like equality in this respect, I hold the steady pursuit of it to be indispensable. What has been the revenue of the Government during the last fourteen years? By whom has it been paid? And where has it been expended? The annual receipts into the treasury in that time have averaged at least twenty-two millions, amounting to more than three hundred millions. The gentleman has truly said, that population is the rule by which contributions should be levied; and as to imports, the consumers, as a general rule, pay the duties. It is also true that this revenue has chiefly been raised by duties. The Western country, comprising Western Pennsylvania, Western Virginia, and the nine Western States, contains about one-third of the population of the United States. Upon these conceded principles, then, the people of this portion of the Union have contributed to the general fund, in the short period of which I am speaking, the enormous amount of one hundred millions of dollars. Yes, sir, they have contributed much more: for, in addition to their common share, they have, since the settlement of the new States, paid directly into the treasury more than forty millions of dollars in the purchase of public lands. And where have these contributions gone? It is, perhaps, easier to tell where they have not gone. They have not returned to the country from which they were drawn, except the miserable pittance dealt out to some old pensioners, a few salaries to federal officers, and a little aid for particular public works, lately drawn through the fire by the efficacy of this same internal improvement operation. But the road on which the heavy wholesale appropriations have travelled to the seaboard is broad and beaten. It needs little improvement. Its track can be seen far off. The by-ways on which the retail business is carried on in the same direction are more difficult to trace. The actual expenditures in the same period, for the increase of the navy, for navy yards, dock yards, and wharves, for fortifications and light-houses, amount to twenty-four millions; and how many millions more have, in the same quarter, been laid out upon sea-walls, harbors, and the like, I have not been at the pains to compute. To the sea-coast and commercial cities are drawn almost the whole contents of the sinking fund chest, which is annually replenished with ten millions to defray the public debt, to say nothing of the officers and agents of the Government in every description of service, who spend their compensation there, and the many inventions sought out to relieve the treasury of its surplus, with some of which I have no acquaintance, except by the appropriation bills. In a word, the interior is tributary to the exterior. The treasury communicates vigor to the one, while the other languishes under its continual exactions. No wonder our condition is intolerable; the wonder is that we have endured it so long. Nothing but the freshness and fertility of our soil has upheld us till now; but the fatness of the land must fail, without something to encourage and repay the toil of the dispirited farmer. I will give you, for example, my own State. Its population is about one-twenty-second part of the national census; of course, according to general principles, it pays about one million annually in the shape of indirect tax. How many dollars of that million usually find their way back again? That which pays a district judge, two district attorneys, two marshals, here and there a pensioner his ninety-six dollars, or less, with the little savings of the members of Congress; and all told. We do not expect this whole million to be returned, nor half of it. It would be unreasonable and impracticable if we did. We have no Government creditors there. Our people had no money to lend for the war. They did their share in fighting. Neither have we any use for fortifications, navy yards, breakwaters, nor any of the apparatus of foreign commerce: but we have some internal commerce, and would with suitable internal improvements have much more. And we humbly conceive that the Government has an equal interest with us in making these to answer its purposes. In accomplishing these
